Sanctified by the great work performed in the wonderful saving of human life—11,864 lives in ten years—never, never was government engaged in such a work before. Nor is this service alone a humane work; it is one of the most arduous under the Government. When we consider that a day means twenty-four hours, and a week seven days, and that day and night these men must patrol the beach through rain or snow, through wind and driving storm—in all weathers—in howling northeasters or the cutting "blizzards" from the northwest, in drenching rains and piercing snow-storms, these sturdy men are required to perform their patrol and other duties with soldier-like regularity and discipline. Again, is this service sanctified by honest toil? No man will say these men do not earn their scanty pay, even as is proposed by this bill; so do they earn the lasting gratitude of the civilized world, and shall we, their employers and chief admirers, not be generous toward them?

Now, let us inquire what this service has done in the past ten years in the way of saving life and property. These figures speak the loudest for the service, and of themselves present the most convincing argument for the promotion and protection in every way of this Life-Saving Service. I read from Superintendent Kimball's report of this year:

General summary of disasters which have occurred within the scope of life-saving operations, from November 1, 1871, (date of introduction of present system,) to close of fiscal year ending June 30, 1881.

Total number of disasters	1,347
Total value of vessels	$16,083,320
Total value of cargoes	$8,429,167
Total value of property saved	$14,958,895
Total value of property lost	$9,553,592
Total number of persons on vessels	12,259
Total number of persons saved	*11,864
Total number of lives lost	†295
Total number of persons succored	2,610
Total number of days' succor afforded	7,059

* In addition, sixteen persons were saved this year who were not on board vessels.

† One hundred and eighty-three of these were lost at the disasters of the steamers Huron and Metropolis—in the case of the former when the stations were not open, and in the latter when service was impeded by distance; and fourteen others in the same year owing to similar causes.

It should be observed that the operations of the service during this period have been limited as follows: season of 1871–'72, to the coasts of Long Island and New Jersey; seasons of 1872–'74, to coasts of Cape Cod, Long Island, New Jersey; seasons of 1874–'75, to the coasts of New England, Long Island, New Jersey, and coast from Cape Henry to Cape Hatteras; season of 1875–'76, coasts of New England, Long Island, New Jersey, coast from Cape Henlopen to Cape Charles, and coast from Cape Henry to Cape Hatteras; seasons of 1876–'77, and since, all the foregoing, with the addition of the eastern coast of Florida and portions of the lake coasts; and during the past year the coast of Texas.

Now, it will be noticed from the figures and facts just presented that of the 395 lives lost 183 were lost on the wrecks of the Huron and Metropolis. On the Huron 98, November 24, 1877, just six days before the service was permitted under the law to man the stations, and the other, wreck of the Metropolis, January, 1878, between stations eight miles apart, and just where the vigilant officers of the service had asked for a station and been refused by the superabundant wisdom or supercilious economy of Congress. Should not the loss of life in these two instances furnish warning enough to us in that we should not do anything to cripple this branch of the public service? Twelve thousand two hundred and fifty-nine shipwrecked people on the shores of the United States, and only 212 lost where the service was allowed to be effective by Congress; a loss of but 1¾ per cent., very much of this loss caused by accident of falling spars and such other foreign and untoward circumstances, for which the service is not chargeable.

I claim for this army of life-savers magnanimity. I am deeply interested in the fullest protection to this service, because I can bring the matter home to my own district, because I know many of our little army of three hundred and twelve men on the New Jersey coast. These men I know have faithfully served the commercial world. Their life is more exposed than the soldiers, and their hardships in instances even more severe. Shall they not receive protection when worn out with exertion or crippled by disaster? Shall we longer leave them suffer on scanty pay at the most so that when they die it is with the consciousness that after a life devoted to the service of their country their families are left to starve or die in the poor-house?

And this parsimonious Government has forced them to work for $40 per month where every day is twenty-four hours and with no prospect of protection to family in case of death or disability. Should we not remedy this gross injustice without delay? I believe the Department has secured at the hands of this Congress through this bill an appropriation that will enable them to pay better wages. I know many of these men; I know their work, and I say that they should have been treated as they have been through inadequate appropriation is a shame and a disgrace to our legislation of the past. Now, let us rectify it and make amends as far as possible for the sufferings of the past. Let us complete our work in this direction. Let us do our whole duty. Let this Congress have the credit of protecting our life-saving men as justice and humanity demands; nay, more than that, let this Congress have the credit of being generous to this service; and I do believe that every man who supports this service to the fullest extent of every law yet proposed will be satisfied when finished and know that he has done his duty. And the verdict of the people at home will be, "well done, good and faithful servant."

That we may understand what the condition of the public mind really is, I quote from many newspapers in different parts of the country.

Says the Trenton, New Jersey, State Gazette, December 8:

The Government cannot afford to be mean and niggardly to these heroic men.

Says the New York Herald:

Those connected with it, in whatever capacity, are as a rule a brave, intelligent, fearless class of men. The gallant men who keep guard along our coast and peril their lives to save life and property are entitled to the highest rewards and honors.

Says the Northwestern Christian Advocate:

Write to your Congressmen and instruct them to vote liberally for this splendid department.

Says the New York Star, December 10:

The pay for this noble work is absurdly small; Congress ought to double it at once.

Says the Yarmouth Register, Yarmouth Port, Massachusetts, of December 10:

No class of men are so poorly paid as these men, and none are called upon to perform more arduous service, or one of higher responsibility, and calling for the exercise of more heroic qualities.

Says the Milwaukee Sentinel of December 15:

If the coast service is worth having, it is worth paying for to the extent of affording the men engaged in it as ample pay as they would be likely to receive in ordinary employment, where the same kind of ability is required.

Says the New York Maritime Register of January 11:

The country cannot afford to have the efficiency of this service impaired. The pay of these men is miserably small. Congress is to blame for this, and Congressmen should attend to their duty in this matter.

Says the Marine Record, of Cleveland, December 17:

It is a great shame that these brave and hard-working fellows should be expected to support themselves on the mere pittance now given them.

Says the Springfield (Massachusets) Republican of December 13:

The movement for securing adequate pay to the brave men employed by the United States Life-Saving Service receives general indorsement, and there should be no doubt of speedy action by Congress.

Says the Milwaukee Sunday News of December 11:

No class of men is so poorly paid as are these brave fellows, who at midnight, in the face of a blinding snow-storm, are compelled to launch a boat in treacherous breakers and pull through mountainous waves to the rescue of sailors in distress.

Says the Advocate, Provincetown, Massachusetts, of December 8:

It does not appear how the service can be maintained unless the money is provided to pay the men compensation for the severe toil and great perils they undergo.

From Governor Ludlow's (New Jersey) message to Legislature:

There is no class of public servants which is more deserving of encouragement and liberal support than these. They have displayed a heroism and daring worthy of the highest commendation.

Says the New York Maritime Register of December 14:

The station men should be made to feel that the peculiar and dangerous character of their noble work is so fully appreciated that the nation will always make ample provision for them and their families.

Says the Washington Sunday Herald of January 5:

Let this Congress appropriate for proper compensation for their service while living, and pass the bill to keep their children from starvation when they are dead. Let this thing no longer be to shame us.

Says the Trenton (New Jersey) State Gazette of January 18:

The miserable pittance these men receive for their services is disgracefully incommensurate with the hardships they endure, the perils they encounter, and the arduous and disagreeable duties they perform.

Says the Provincetown (Massachusetts) Advocate of December 15.

If Congress turns a cold shoulder now, scores of keepers and surfmen are ready to retire and leave the service in the hands of the inexperienced and incompetent.

Says the Long Branch (New Jersey) Mirror of December 10:

The brave fellows whose life is spent amid hardship and peril get the poorest pay of any employes in the Government service.

Says the Trenton (New Jersey) State Gazette of January 18:

It is high time that justice was done these hardy and heroic men, and we have little patience with any factious and quibbling obstacles that may be interposed thereto.

Says the Long Branch Mirror of December 17:

The objects of the establishment of the Life-Saving Service were and are in the cause of humanity and for a higher, nobler purpose than for subserviency to political machinery.

Says the Detroit Post and Tribune of January 4:

The heroism of these men is something that cannot be weighed in the Treasury's balance; no government can find any equivalent for the risks they run and the price they pay in loss of health and life.

Says the Boston Sunday Herald of December 25:

The men are expected to remain at the station night and day, and the compensation they receive for their arduous and extremely dangerous services is entirely inadequate.

Says the Detroit Post and Tribune of January 4:

This country is rich enough to pay well for such service as these men render, and it deserves all the scorn it is likely to get at home and abroad for its niggardliness to the bravest men in its service.

Says the Buffalo Express of January 24:

It is indecent in so rich and so profuse a Government as ours to demand and expect such services of skill, courage, and endurance for such pittances.

Says the New York Maritime Register of September 21:

In the reach of the Life-Saving Service it is better to be generous in the expenditures than to err on the side of too great economy.

Says the New York Journal of Commerce of November 25:

Considering the meagerness of the pay, it must be said that the Life-Saving Service is one of the most efficient of Government bureaus.

Says the New York Telegram of November 23:

Certainly $8 per week is a very paltry sum to deal out to men who risk their lives and health in a most laborious service. A larger compensation should have been assured to these men long before.

Says the New York Commercial Advertiser of November 23:

The members of the Life-Saving Service are among the most faithful and hard-working men in the Government employ.

Says the New York Nautical Gazette of October 15:

We sincerely trust that the friends of the Life-Saving Service in every section of the country will lose no opportunity of urging upon their members of Congress the imperative necessity of increasing the pay of keepers and surfmen of the Life-Saving Service.

Says the Cleveland Leader of September 8:

Nowhere else in the Government service does the expenditure of so little money produce such an amount of good as in the Life-Saving Service.

Says the Boston Daily Advertiser of September 1:

This department of the Government service is one of the most necessary, as it is one of the most hazardous, now in existence.

Says the Buffalo Commercial of September 2:

The hard-working members of the Life-Saving Department are paid salaries shamefully inadequate to the valuable services they render.

Says the Freehold (New Jersey) Inquirer of November 26:

This service is not only a commercial necessity, but it sets forth the humanity of the national heart. Double the cost of it, and the money will be a recompense in a duty well done, if not in dollars.

Says the Boston Daily Advertiser of September 6:

No class of public servants are paid so poorly.

Says the New York Nautical Gazette of September 24:

These men should be well paid for their services. The nation can well afford it, and Congress should not hesitate to see that simple justice be done to these angels of the beaches.

Says the New York Telegram of November 8:

The life these men lead is one of great hardship, and the compensating pleasures are reduced almost to nothing.

Says the New York Commercial Advertiser of December 8:

Their life is more exposed than the soldier's, and the hardships in instances even more severe. They receive no pensions when worn out with exertion or crippled by disaster, and when they die it is with the consciousness that after a life devoted to the service of their country their families are left to starve or die in the poor-house.

Says the New York Telegram of August 31:

The Government, the interests of commerce, and the cause of humanity are virtually beggars to these guardians of our coasts.

Says the Syracuse (New York) Standard of September 23:

Let Congress at once raise the wages of these noble life savers.

Says the Chicago Inter-Ocean of October 22:

The Government, which employs these brave men, acts entirely to the contrary of every established rule of business precedent, and offers no encouragement whatever to the best brawn to enter its most important and exacting department.

From minutes of the annual session of the National Board of Steam-Navigation, convened at Washington October 5:

Resolved, That it is in the interest of commerce and navigation that the Life-Saving Service shall be preserved in its integrity, and we therefore earnestly recommend to Congress that measures be at once taken to prevent it from falling into a dreary and possible disintegration, by providing for such rates of compensation to its officers and crews as shall insure to it the retention of first-class men.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that the surfmen could not have been paid at least $60 per month; but the action of the conference committee cannot now be antagonized without serious danger to this bill, and so I am forced to rest content.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I think this matter is now sufficiently understood by the House. I therefore move the adoption of the report, and on that motion I ask the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. REAGAN. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 154, nays 55, not voting 82; as follows:

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, with Mr. ERMENTROUT.

Mr. HENDERSON with Mr. MORRISON.

Mr. PAGE with Mr. BAYNE. Mr. PAGE would vote "ay" and Mr. BAYNE "no."

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I am paired with Mr. BEACH on political questions, and not regarding this as such, I have voted.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I move that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection and it is so ordered.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the Committee of Conference was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. COX, of New York, and Mr. LATHAM, by unanimous consent, were granted leave to print remarks on the Life-Saving Service. [See Appendix.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CALKINS. I call up the contested-election case of Lynch vs. Chalmers.

Mr. HAWK. I hope the gentleman will not do that until I can offer a resolution which is important in reference to the condition of the folding-room.

Mr. CALKINS. I must call up the unfinished business.

AGREEMENT WITH CROW INDIANS.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. Yesterday by unanimous consent the bill (S. No. 1045) to accept and ratify an agreement with the Crow Indians for the sale of a portion of their reservation in the Territory of Montana required for the use of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same, was called up, and the reading of it was almost finished when the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] objected, and it was then agreed by unanimous consent the bill should be printed in the RECORD and be called up this morning.

There is nothing in it, Mr. Speaker, more than this: the Secretary of the Interior held that the Northern Pacific Railroad Company had a right of way through this Crow reservation, but claimed as an act of justice, although it had a legal right, it would be better to pay for it. A commission was sent out which made an agreement with these Indians, and the company agreed to pay $25,000, although I believe there is no legal obligation on the company to do it. As this railroad company is trying to do a decent thing toward the Indians, which railroads rarely do, I hope there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask for unanimous consent.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not yield for asking unanimous consent. Does it require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. MAGINNIS. It was understood by unanimous consent it should come up yesterday.

The SPEAKER. It was agreed it should be printed in the RECORD, and it appears there this morning.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I know the RECORD says so, but the bill was printed in the RECORD to be called up this morning.

The SPEAKER. This could only come up at all events by unanimous consent at this time.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I understand that, sir; but my request was not stated correctly yesterday, as gentlemen around me will bear witness. I asked that the bill be printed in the RECORD with the understanding that it was to come up for completion this morning. Of course I understood that the passage of the bill could only be by unanimous consent, but on yesterday objection was made by the gentleman from New Jersey after the bill had been nearly read through, and though I do not now see him in his seat, he reserved, of course, the right to object to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can only say, in response to the gentleman from Montana, that this bill can come up this morning by unanimous consent alone.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. If this requires unanimous consent, I shall object.

Mr. RANDALL. I have been trying for a long time to get a bill up for the relief of sufferers at the Frankford arsenal, where a number of lives were lost, but have been met with objection constantly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question to the House. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill which the gentleman from Montana proposes?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Does the Chair decide that the bill does not come up this morning by consent, in view of what took place on yesterday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the bill could only come before the House by unanimous consent to-day, and objection has been made. It was understood that the gentleman was to call it up to-day, but like any other matter it would still be subject to unanimous consent; and the Chair will also state that it could not have the preference under any circumstances, in view of the fact that the unfinished business of yesterday, which is a question of the highest privilege, has been called up.

Mr. CALKINS. I demand the regular order.

PRINTING OF SENATE BILLS.

Mr. REED. I would like to offer an order which has relation to the business of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us hear what it is.

Mr. REED. I offer the following:

Ordered, That the bills of the Senate of a public character now on the Speaker's table be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. That is right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the order?

Mr. HOLMAN. This is simply to print the bills?

The SPEAKER. To print only.

Mr. VAN HORN. Are not these bills already printed?

Mr. REED. In many cases they are not. Where there has been a Senate amendment, or where numerous amendments have been appended to bills, they are sometimes printed and others are not. It is a very difficult matter in many cases to get at the text of a bill, and this order I think is absolutely necessary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the order suggested by the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONERS OF FISH AND FISHERIES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit at this time a Senate concurrent resolution in relation to printing, which under the law is required to be submitted and referred.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That there be printed 10,000 extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries for the year 1881, of which 2,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 6,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,500 for the use of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, the illustrations to be made by the Public Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing, and 500 for sale by the Public Printer, under such regulations as the Joint Committee on Printing may prescribe, at a price equal to the additional cost of publication and 10 per cent. thereto added.

Mr. RANDALL. Let that go to the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. It will be referred, under the rule, to the Committee on Printing.

EXPENDITURES, BOSTON NAVY-YARD.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, with accompanying papers, in response to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 12th of April, 1882, covering a tabulated statement of expenditures in the Boston navy-yard during the last fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

GILBERT S. JENNINGS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a petition of First Lieutenant Gilbert S. Jennings, retired, for such legislation as will give him the rank and pay of colonel on the retired list from the date of his retirement from active service June 18, 1878, together with a letter from the Adjutant-General in the case; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—LYNCH VS. CHALMERS.

Mr. CALKINS. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the further consideration of the contested-election case.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. The report in this case was made on the 6th of April and printed about a week or ten days afterward. Considering that one of the few Democrats on the Committee on Elections was detained at home while the same was being considered, by serious illness in his family, and considering that this was a measure of the highest privilege, that might be called up at any time, we had a right to suppose that it would not be precipitated upon the attention of the House. We were also informed by the members of the Committee on Ways and Means on this side of the House that that committee had unanimously agreed to occupy all the time until to-morrow in the discussion of the tariff. But as the report contains but few legal questions, and upon them must depend the decision of this case, we complain not, though the matter be before the House sooner than we had expected.

On the first day of the session, after the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOORE] had made the memorable objection to Mr. Chalmers's taking the oath of office, which he recalled in his speech yesterday, and after the objection of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Elections to the swearing in of Mr. DIBBLE, of South Carolina, the honorable gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BROWNE,] in reply thereto——

Mr. MANNING. We are all desirous of hearing the gentleman from Georgia, but are unable to do so owing to the confusion in the Hall.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will request members to be seated, and will postpone the consideration of public business until the House is in order.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. During this interruption I desire to say what I forgot to say in the beginning: that on yesterday, seeing a recognition out of the regular order, and not knowing just what it meant, I objected to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] retaining the balance of his hour after fifteen minutes had been yielded to another gentleman. Having learned that it was perfectly proper, I desire to withdraw the objection which I then made. I am requested also, in behalf of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ATHERTON,] who likewise objected, to withdraw his objection.

I proceed now to read the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] on the organization of the House, in reply to the chairman of the Committee on Elections. This was the conclusion of his speech:

I say to my Republican friends and all others that we cannot afford to establish bad precedents in cases of this kind. I have seen something of the consequences of bad precedents in election cases. So far as I am concerned, I am determined to make a clean record, and consider these questions as judicial ones, and vote according to my conscience and my judgment.

It is to that class of gentlemen of this House, who have the courage of their convictions, I propose to address my argument to-day. In doing that I beg to say that, necessarily, I will have to go over much of the ground covered by the minority report. It was not printed in the RECORD because of an objection from the other side on yesterday; and, therefore, for me to do so now is pardonable.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE AND THE DECISION OF THE SUPREME COURT OF MISSISSIPPI.

The proper officers of Mississippi certified that Chalmers had a majority of 3,779 over Lynch, his sole competitor for a seat in this House as the Representative from the sixth district of that State.

In a bill in chancery, filed by Lynch on the 16th of November, 1880, to enjoin the secretary of state of Mississippi from issuing to Chalmers the usual certificate of election, Lynch swore that his vote was 10,775, and Chalmers's vote was but 10,216, thus leaving him elected by 559 majority. In it he contended that the commissioners of election in some of the counties had rejected illegally 5,402 votes, which should have been counted for him, and 1,044 votes which should have been counted for Chalmers.

Failing to enjoin the secretary of state (but without a trial of his bill) he began and carried on his contest against Chalmers under sections 105 to 130, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes of the United States. Meanwhile Chalmers having a proper certificate of election, and therefore prima facie entitled to the seat, was sworn in and must retain his place unless Lynch has shown that Chalmers was not and that he, Lynch, was elected such Representative. The notice of contest charged improper conduct on the part of Chalmers's friends. But fortunately for us there is no evidence raising those charges up to the dignity of things to be now noticed.

This "Shoestring district" is five hundred miles long, and about forty miles wide. It is without any considerable town except Vicksburgh, and is almost wholly rural. By the last census, in six of the counties named below there are 5,795 more colored voters than white voters, and in these Chalmers had a majority of 1,762. Lynch, by his sworn bill in chancery, put them down thus:

Counties.	Chalmers.	Lynch.
Claiborne	1,061	288	See record, p. 10.
Quitman	153	83	See record, p. 10.
Sharkey	484	175	See record, p. 10.
Tunica	239	506	See record, p. 10.
Wilkinson	1,691	814	See record, p. 10.
Five counties	3,628	1,866

And as to them he utters no word of complaint, and of course the committee make none. It confined itself to the other counties. In them alone did they find matter for investigation. After a long labor their conclusion was this:

The corrected vote of the parties will stand thus:

	Lynch.	Chalmers.
Returned vote	5,393	9,172
Add rejected votes:
Warren County	2,029	20
Dead Man's Bend	85	15
Palestine	231	17
Australia	192	30
Bolivar	311	45
Hays's Landing	39	24
Ben Lomond	332	20
Duncansby	371	45
Rodney	247	92
Stoneville	315	60
	9,545	9,540
From which we deduct		190
And add that number to Lynch's vote to correct the returns in Kingston precinct, Adams County	190
Which makes total	9,735	9,350
Majority for Lynch	385

This table shows Lynch elected by only 385 votes. Following it, on page 22 of the report, is another table making Lynch's majority 623, and a third giving him 1,043 majority. But the committee urge only the first as reliable. Their language is:

These tabulated statements are made for the information of the House. The first tabulated statement shows the result which the undersigned members of the committee all concur in, and upon which the report is based.

Your committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That James R. Chalmers was not elected, and is not entitled to his seat in the Forty-seventh Congress from the sixth district of Mississippi.

Resolved, That John R. Lynch was elected, and is entitled to his seat in the Forty-seventh Congress from the sixth district of Mississippi.

Now, consider that the practice of the committee is to submit the cases to sub-committees, and for the sub-committees to report, and the general committee to join unless they dissent. Consider further that on the sub-committee which considered this case were only three Republicans and two Democrats, and the report loses much of its weight.

The issues between the majority and minority of the committee are not of fact but of law, pure and simple. As put by the minority, they are these:

First. Will Congress receive and count votes of which there is no evidence, except the certificate of a chancery clerk, as to what purports to be a transcript of election returns of record in his office, when there is no law in Mississippi authorizing any record to be made of election returns by any officer, and when neither the chancery nor circuit clerk, nor any other officer in Mississippi, is by law made the custodian of the election returns after they have been counted by the commissioners of election?

Second. Can Congress count votes which were rejected by the county commissioners because they were not certified to by the inspector, as required by law, when there is no other proof of their validity except the fact that the commissioners of election in their statement of the result give the number of ballots so rejected?

Third. Will Congress refuse to follow the construction of a State statute of election given by a State court?

To put them in a different shape and reversing the order, they would be, first, shall the "marked" tickets be counted? Second, shall the votes not certified by the inspectors be counted? And third, shall the votes certified by the chancery clerk be counted? The majority answers each of these questions affirmatively, and the minority answers them negatively. Chalmers is seated. The burden to unseat him rests upon the contestant. If the majority errs as to either of these propositions, their case, as they confess, must fall to the ground.

Let us examine the questions in that order.

REJECTED TICKETS.

Certain tickets for Chalmers were rejected because they had marks upon them. Tickets like them were received and counted. That was because the commissioners of election in the different counties differed as to whether such tickets should be rejected. Many such were cast for Lynch and many of them were rejected. They were as appears by this fac-simile copy, namely:

It is headed "Republican Ticket." Under those words is a dash three-eighths of an inch long, thus: ——. Then follow "For President," and below them "James A. Garfield." Under that is another dash three-quarters of an inch long, or two dashes like the former, put end to end, with a circle or "o" between them, thus: ——o——. Then follow "For Vice-President," and under that "Chester A. Arthur;" under that is a dash like the first. Then follows "For Electors for President and Vice-President," and the names of the electors with their several honorary titles, as "Hon.," "Dr.," Capt.," and "Judge." Then comes a dash like the second, and after it the following words:

"For Member of the House of Representatives from the 6th Congressional District.
"JOHN R. LYNCH."

Whether these tickets were rightfully rejected depends upon the law of the State of Mississippi. The code of 1880 of that State makes the following provisions as to elections, namely: "The board of registration of each county furnishes poll-books to the clerk of the circuit court of the county who shall carefully preserve them as records of his office." From them he shall make up poll-books or lists of registered voters for each precinct, and these poll-books he shall deliver to the commissioners of election in time for every election, who shall return them after the election. In case of change of residence of a registered voter this clerk may erase old registry and reregister him. (See sections 105, 106, 107.) The commissioners of election for each county appoint for each election precinct three inspectors, all of whom may not be of the same political party. The commissioners furnish at each precinct a ballot-box—secured by good and substantial locks, and if an adjournment shall take place after opening the polls and before all the votes shall be counted the box shall be securely closed and locked, so as to prevent the admission of anything into it during the time of adjournment, and the box shall be kept by one of the inspectors and the key by another of the inspectors, and the inspector having the box shall carefully keep it and neither unlock nor open it himself, nor permit it to be done, or permit any person to have any access to it, during the time of such adjournment.

SEC. 137. All ballots shall be written or printed in black ink, with a space not less than one-fifth of an inch between each name, on plain white printing news-paper, not more than two and one half nor less than two and one-fourth inches wide, without any device or mark by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another, except the words at the head of the ticket; but this shall not prohibit the erasure, correction, or insertion of any name by pencil-mark or ink upon the face of the ballot; and a ticket different from that herein prescribed shall not be received or counted.

SEC. 138. When the results shall have been ascertained by the inspectors, they, or one of them, or some fit person designated by them, shall, by twelve o'clock noon of the second day after the election, deliver to the commissioners of election, at the court-house of the county, a statement of the whole number of votes given for each person and for what office; and the said commissioners of election shall canvass the returns so made to them, and shall ascertain and disclose the results, and shall, within ten days after the day of said election, deliver a certificate of his election to the person having the greatest number of votes for any office, &c.

SEC. 139. The statement of the result of the election at their precincts shall be certified and signed by the inspectors and clerks, and the poll-book, tally-list, list of voters, ballot-boxes, and ballots shall be delivered as above required to the commissioners of election.

SEC. 140. The commissioners of election shall, within ten days after the election, transmit to the secretary of state, to be filed in his office, a statement of the whole number of votes given in their county for each candidate voted for for any office at such election, &c.

The tickets marked as stated were received by the inspectors and returned to the commissioners. But when the commissioners in the several counties came to canvass the returns so made to them and ascertain and disclose the results, in some counties they rejected the marked tickets. This they did because they held that the marks already described violated the section 137, which required tickets to be "without any device or mark by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another except the words at the head of the ticket," and because the same section concluded with these imperative words, "and a ticket different from that herein prescribed shall not be received or counted."

The commissioners found no difficulty in knowing and distinguishing these tickets from the others, and yet they were fac-similes of the others, except as to those dashes. It was by those dashes that they were known and distinguished; they were the devices and marks covered by the statute, as the commissioners thought. Advised of this conclusion, Lynch sought to enjoin the secretary of state from issuing for Chalmers the usual certificate of election, as has been stated. His application was to Judge Campbell, of the supreme court. He declined to enjoin upon the following grounds: "Because the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States is the exclusive judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," (made so by the Constitution of the United States,) and a decision of the question as to the election of a member of Congress by any other tribunal would not be authoritative or final. Besides this, the chancery court is not authorized to decide contested elections, and whatever its right, if any, to enjoin in aid of a contest inaugurated in a court of the State, which such court could lawfully determine, it appears to be clear that interference by injunction to prevent an executive officer from performing a duty prescribed by law, in reference to an election as to which no court can decide, so as to conclude any body or thing, would be without the semblance of right.

The law was new, passed in 1880, and needed construction. In Tunica County the commissioners counted 506 tickets, of which this is a fac-simile.

For Member of the House of Representatives from the 6th Congressional District.

JOHN R. LYNCH.

The question was carried to the courts in this way. Section 2542 of the Code of Mississippi provided that—

> On the petition of the State by its attorney-general, or a district attorney, in any matter affecting the public interest, or on petition of any private person who is interested, the writ of mandamus shall be issued by a circuit court commanding any inferior tribunal, corporation, board, officer or person to do or not to do an act, the performance or omission of which the law especially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station, and where there is not a plain, adequate, and speedy remedy in the ordinary course of law.

Under that the district attorney filed a petition in the circuit court of Tunica County asking a mandamus to compel the commissioners of that county to recanvass its vote and reject said 506 tickets because they were so marked, and therefore illegal. The commissioners demurred to the petition upon the grounds that—

> First. That they are merely ministerial officers and have no power to reject ballots that have been counted by the inspectors.
> Second. That the marks on the ballots for which it is claimed they should be rejected are mere printers' dashes, and are not such distinguishing marks as were contemplated by the statute.

The court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the petition. The district attorney appealed to the supreme court. The judgment of the court below was reversed. Chalmers, chief-justice, did not preside because his brother, the sitting member, was interested in the question. The opinion was delivered by Campbell, justice, as follows:

This case presents for adjudication three questions, namely:

1. Whether the commissioners of election have the right to reject illegal ballots cast and counted by the inspectors of election and returned to them with the statement of the result at the precincts.

2. Whether the ballots which the commissioners of election for Tunica County refused to reject should have been rejected by them as being illegal for having on them a device or mark by which one may be known or distinguished from another.

3. Whether the action of the commissioners was final, or whether they may be required by mandamus to meet and act in the matter again as the court may order.

We think it clear that the commissioners of election have the right, which they should exercise, to reject ballots returned to them by the inspectors of the election as having been cast at any of the precincts of their county which show themselves on inspection to be illegal. The law devolves on the commissioners of election the duty to prepare for the election by revising the register of electors and the poll-books of the several precincts so that they may show who are qualified electors, and by appointing inspectors and an officer to keep the peace at each voting place and by distributing ballot-boxes and poll-books. The inspectors are to judge of the qualification of electors so as to receive or reject ballots offered by them, and when the polls are closed the ballots are to be counted and a statement of the whole number of votes given for each person and for what office is to be made, and this statement, certified and signed by inspectors and clerks, and the poll-book, tally lists, list of voters, ballot-boxes, and ballots are to be promptly delivered to the commissioners of election at the court-house of the county, to the end that they may canvass the returns so made to them and see that the result of the election at each precinct, as certified to them by the inspectors and clerks, is correct according to the returns. They are to canvass the returns; that is, they are to scrutinize the acts of those engaged in holding the election at the different places of voting, as shown by the returns made to them in pursuance of law, and determine from such returns who received the greatest number of legal votes, and who is entitled to receive their certificate of election in cases in which they give such certificate, and what return they shall make to the secretary of state.

It is true that commissioners of election are not judicial officers, in the sense of trying causes, hearing evidence, and pronouncing final judgment between parties seeking office, but they are charged with the duty of canvassing returns, which includes the list of voters and list made in counting, and the ballots, and they must examine such returns and declare the legal result and certify it. If they find an error in computation, they must correct it. If they ascertain from the lists of voters that persons not registered, and therefore not legal voters, have cast ballots, they cannot correct that, because of inability to ascertain which ballots are legal and which not; but if they find in the ballot-boxes ballots declared by law to be illegal, and such as shall not be counted, it is their plain duty to reject them; and if in canvassing the returns they ascertain that the inspectors, in disregard of law have counted ballots it says shall not be counted, that error should be corrected by the canvassers as certainly as an error of arithmetic should be. The law makes the inspectors judges of the qualifications of electors from necessity, because they are to receive the ballots, and, when received and deposited in the box it is not supposed by the law to be possible to identify them, but the ballots show for themselves whether or not they conform to law, and there is neither difficulty nor uncertainty in rejecting ballots as being illegal, because of what is shown by them upon inspection. We think the effect of section 137 of the code of 1880 is to condemn as illegal, and not be received or counted, every ballot which has on its back or face any device or mark other than names of persons, by which one ballot may be distinguished from another.

This statute does not condemn devices or marks on the outside of a ballot merely, but clearly embraces the face of the ballot as well. That is apparent from the exception contained in it, and a device or mark on the face of the ballot is as much within what we suppose to have been the object of this provision as one on the outside or back of it. It is apparent from the provision that its object is not only to preserve secrecy as to what ballot an elector casts, which is the leading idea of statutes in some other States, which prohibit any device or mark on a ballot folded which betrays the secret of the voter; its object is to secure absolute uniformity as to the appearance of ballots, in order that intelligence may guide the electors in their selection, and not a mere device or mark by which ignorance may be captivated. The Legislature was trying to prevent multitudes from "being voted" and being guided by a mere device or mark by which they should distinguish the ballots they were to use in the process without a knowledge of the names of persons for whom their ballots were being cast. Elections are a contrivance of government which prescribes who are electors and how they may express their will, and it is a legitimate exercise of power to prescribe the description of ballots which shall be used. Section 137 of the code of 1880 does this, and requires all ballots to be written or printed with black ink, with a minimum space between names, on plain white news printing-paper of a certain width, and without any device or mark by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another, &c.; and it declares that a ticket different from that prescribed shall not be received or counted. Considerations of policy dictated the description of ballots prescribed, and it was deemed of such importance to secure an observance of the requirement that it is declared that ballots not conforming to the description prescribed shall not be received or counted.

It would have been competent to impose a penalty on the circulation or use of such ballots, but the means by which their use is sought to be prevented is the rejection of the ballot when offered or from the count. It is not penal for an elector to use a ballot differing from the legal pattern, but it shall not be counted, and thus he fails to express his will through such an instrumentality. If the device or mark is external, and observed by the inspectors, they should not receive the ballot. If it is received, and on being opened is discovered to be of the kind condemned as illegal, it is not to be counted; but if the inspectors count such ballots in disregard of law and their duty the commissioners of election, assembled at the court-house, with time and opportunity afforded to scrutinize and correct, as far as may be done by the data furnished by the face of the returns, without a resort to evidence aliunde, should reject, as the inspectors should have done, ballots which the law says shall not be counted. The only safe guide as to what ballots are illegal because of devices or marks is the statute. It excludes any mark or device by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another. A distinction between ballots by means of devices or marks instead of by means of the names on them is what the statute aims to prevent, and we are not at liberty to confine the broad language of the statute to any particular description of devices or marks, for ingenuity would evade any such limit. The law should be enforced as written.

There is no room for distinction between what is directory and what is mandatory, what is essential and what is not. The requirement that ballots shall be written or printed with black ink, with a space not less than one-fifth of an inch between names, seems to have been designed to guard against confusion and mistake as to names of the persons voted for for the different offices, while the requirement of plain white news printing-paper of a designated width within narrow limits, and the exclusion of any device or mark by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another, must have been intended to secure uniformity in the appearance of ballots, so that ignorance and blind party devotion might not be led to the adoption of ballots by the guidance of some mark and devices, as to which they were instructed by their leaders, and which, instead of intelligent comprehension of whom or what they are casting their ballots for, should determine their selection of ballots to be cast. It was well known that ballots are prepared beforehand under the direction of political managers, and are distributed for use among electors; and it was further known that captivating marks and devices on ballots, appealing to ignorance and blind party zeal, were a favorite resort as an electioneering device deemed legitimate and freely practiced with much effect; and the purpose of section 137 was to stop this pernicious practice and to make the prohibition effective by prohibiting any mark or device by which one ticket can be distinguished from another, and by rejecting any ballot in violation of its requirements. It was assumed that ballots would still be prepared beforehand by party managers or persons interested in having them legal, and that, as all would be alike, the advantage to one party over another should not consist in tickets, but that ballots must be selected not by devices and marks, but because of the names to be voted for.

We do not think that the commissioners of election can be required to meet and recanvass the returns of the election. Having made their canvass and declared the result, and transmitted a statement of it to the secretary of state, their connection with the returns ended. Any error committed by them is not to be corrected by requiring them to reassemble and correct it. The legality of their action may be the subject of judicial investigation in cases in which provision is made for contesting the election by an appeal to the courts of the State, but only in those cases.

The House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States is the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and the courts of the State have nothing to do with this matter.

This case might properly have been disposed of without considering any of the questions made by the record except that last mentioned, but the attorney-general informed us from the bar that doubts exist as to the proper interpretation of the election law of 1880, and that criminal prosecutions have been instituted against the commissioners of election of some of the counties for supposed violations of the law in reference to their duties, and we have complied with his request in declaring our view of the several questions presented by the record.

Judgment affirmed. To be reported.

George, J., concurring:

I concur entirely in the opinion of the court as drawn up by Judge Campbell. The duty to examine and reject illegal ballots rests on every officer or court required or authorized by law to count them. The statute prohibits the use of any mark or device on a ballot by which one "ticket may be known or distinguished from another." That the mark or device adopted is a mere printer's mark, commonly used for ornamentation, makes no difference. The statute prohibits any distinguishing mark whatever, and no court has the right to do away with the effect of the statute by holding that marks which are mere printers' ornaments may be used. It is wholly unimportant whether the marking on the ticket was the result of ignorance or a design to evade the statute. The inspectors and commissioners have no power to inquire into motives; nor has the statute made motives important. It condemns as illegal every ballot or ticket which is so marked "that it may be known or distinguished from another." The ticket used in this case and made an exhibit to the petition is thus marked, and should have been rejected. We have nothing to do with the policy or impolicy of the statute. The language is plain and does not admit of construction; and it is the duty of the courts and other officers to obey and enforce it in the sense the words clearly indicate.

The House should follow the construction of the Mississippi statute made by her supreme court. It is plain, therefore, that the court decided that the commissioners of elections were bound by law "to reject illegal ballots cast and counted by the inspectors of elections and returned to them with the statement of the result at the polls;" that they should have rejected the 506 marked ballots as illegal "for having on them a device or mark by which one may be known or distinguished from another." But the court held that the commissioners, having decided and declared the result, could not be reassembled and made to change that result.

If this construction of the statute is correct, all tickets so marked were illegal and ought not to have been counted in Mississippi and ought not to be counted here. Should the House act upon that construction? We answer in the affirmative. First, because the House should follow the construction made by the highest judicial tribunal of the State whose statute is under investigation. The Supreme Court of the United States is absolutely supreme, answerable to no tribunal and to no constituency. If it would be governed by such a construction surely this House, not a judicial body but accustomed to seek its law in the statutes and reports, should feel so bound. That that court would follow such a construction ordinarily none can doubt. The rule has been uniform from Shelby vs. Gray, 11 Wheaton, down to its latest utterances. Since 1789, at its birth, it has acted under the statutory requirement that "the laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States in cases where they apply." And always it has held that "the laws of the several States" are to be sought for, not in the statute-books only, but in the reports also, and that the construction of a State law by the highest judicial tribunal of that State determines what is that law. (See Green vs. Neal, 6 Peters, 291.)

The majority report says:

> It is seriously contended by the contestee that the decision of the supreme court of Mississippi construing the sections of the election laws of that State ought to be followed by Congress, and that it is against the settled doctrine of both Congress and the Federal judiciary to disregard the decisions of State tribunals in construing their own local laws. This is too broadly asserted and cannot be maintained. It is true that where a decision or a line of decisions has been made by the judiciary of the States and those decisions have become a "rule of property," the Federal judiciary will follow them. Not to do so would continually place titles to property in jeopardy and disturb all business transactions. The rule as to all other questions is well stated in Township of Pine Grove vs. Talcott, (19 Wall., 666, 667,) as follows:
> "It is insisted that the invalidity of the statute has been determined by two judgments of the supreme court of Michigan, and that we are bound to follow these adjudications. With all respect for the eminent tribunal by which the judgments were pronounced, we must be permitted to say that they are not satisfactory to our minds. * * * The question before us belongs to the domain of general jurisprudence. In this class of cases this court is not bound by the judgment of the courts of States where the cases arise; it must hear and determine for itself."

That the Supreme Court of the United States will follow a "line of decisions" of a State supreme court construing a statute of that State, which have become a rule of property, is true. But it will not wait for such a line of cases before following. Outside of the excepted cases mentioned in 18 Howard, 595, and 8 Wallace, 575, Federal questions, 17 Wallace, 648, it follows any such decision. It will follow the latest when they are not in "line." (2 Black, 599; 4 Wallace, 136.)

The constitution of Mississippi, adopted in 1832, forbade the introduction of slaves there for sale. In Graves vs. Slaughter, 15 Peters, 449, the United States Supreme Court held that a note given for such slaves could be recovered, because the State had passed no law to give effect to the constitutional prohibition. Afterward, in Brien vs. Williamson, (7 Howard, Mississippi Reports,) the supreme court of Mississippi held the reverse, and after that the Supreme Court of the United States changed. This was its language:

> Undoubtedly this court will always feel itself bound to respect the decisions of the State courts, and from the time they are made will regard them as conclusive in all cases upon the construction of their own constitution and laws. (Rowan vs. Runnels, 5 Howard, United States Reports, 139.)

Secure in its own grand powers and free from the petty weakness which would make it doubt the integrity or discount the ability of the State courts, it admits that their decisions upon their own statutes are authoritative.

Nor is it confined to "property" in any narrow sense. It covers all rights which may be litigated. Besides, the office of Representative is "property" very valuable to the possessor and sacred to his constituency. (See Ex parte Garland, 4 Wallace, and cases cited.)

And the House of Representatives has uniformly not only followed the construction put upon State laws by the State supreme courts but by State executives as well. The rule was well expressed by the Committee on Elections in the Tennessee cases in the Forty-second Congress. We quote it:

> It is a well established and most salutary rule that where the proper authorities of a State government have given a construction to their own constitution or statutes, that construction will be followed by the Federal authorities. This rule is absolutely necessary to the harmonious working of our complex governments, State and national, and your committee are not disposed to be the first to depart from it.

The Forty-sixth Congress followed the construction of Iowa's constitution by her governor and kept in Republican Representatives, though Iowa's Legislature now hold otherwise, and another Congress would follow this last construction. As another escape from this rule the majority report uses this language:

> Every State election law is by the Constitution made a Federal law where Congress has failed to enact laws on that subject, and is adopted by Congress for the purpose of the election of its own members. (Page 10.)

This language is strangely involved. It declares that State election laws are made "Federal law" by the Constitution and "adopted by Congress." It sounds oddly to talk of Congress adopting a constitutional result. But there is no such thing in the Constitution; and if there were the construction of them by the proper tribunals would still fix the law, for in the same sense construction by the State courts would pro hac vice become Federal. There is no such thought in the instrument. Its only language on the subject is: "The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof, but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators." Congress has not legislated as to the "manner" of the election of Representatives, except to require them to be elected for districts and that the voting shall be "by written or printed ballot; and all votes received or recorded contrary to this section shall be of no effect," (Revised Statutes United States, sections 23-27,) and as to the duties of election supervisors. (Ib., section 2026, &c.)

The majority report continues this language:

> To say that Congress shall be absolutely bound by State adjudication on the subject of the election of its own members is subversive of the constitutional provision that each House shall be the judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own members, and is likewise inimical to the soundest principles of national unity.
> The foundation of this contention is that if the Congress of the United States fails to enact election laws, and makes use of State laws for its purposes, it adopts not only the laws thus enacted, but the judicial construction of them by the State courts as well. (Page 10.)

None contend "that Congress shall be absolutely bound" by such decisions. The Supreme Court is not "absolutely bound;" it can disregard them. But it follows them for high considerations of public good. A court of errors is not "absolutely bound" by the verdict of a jury, but will not set it aside unless it "shocks the moral sense." So this House should follow a State construction of the State law, unless it is manifestly absurd. "The constitutional provision that each House shall be the judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own members" means that the judgment should be according to law. That law when Congress has not acted is the State law, and the State law is the State statute as construed by the State supreme court. We know not what the majority means when it says this idea is "likewise inimical to the soundest principles of national unity." Certainly it is not at war with our constitutional national unity.

The next point is that Congress should follow State decisions construing these State statutes only where "decisions have been continued and uniform in such a way and for such time as to become the fixed and settled law of a State." "Where decisions have been made for a sufficient length of time by State tribunals construing election laws so that it may be presumed that the people of the State knew what such interpretations were would furnish another good reason why Congress should adopt them in Congressional election cases. But this reason would be of little weight when the election had been held in good faith before such judicial construction had been made, and where there was a conflict of opinion respecting the true interpretation of a statute for the first time on trial."

Such has not always been the language of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Elections. In the Forty-sixth Congress he submitted a minority report signed by himself, Speaker KEIFER, and Mr. Weaver. In it he used this language:

We think this question, under the present constitution and laws of Pennsylvania, not an open one. The highest court of judicature of the State has decided it; at least it has given a construction to that part of the new constitution under consideration, and we quote therefrom. (Report, page 41.)

That was a single decision, not "a line" of them, and yet under it a Democrat was refused a seat in a Democratic House.

In the same Congress, in the case of Bisbee vs. Hull, from Florida, Mr. CALKINS objected to Hull's being sworn in upon a regular certificate. He said:

How can this certificate stand, even as establishing a prima facie right, when the basis upon which it rests has been swept away by a decision of the supreme court of the State of Florida!

After Hull was sworn in his case went to the Committee on Elections, and it unanimously followed an opinion of the supreme court of Florida, construing the Florida election laws—only one decision, and that, too, made after the election. Speaker KEIFER drew that report. It contained this language:

The opinion of the supreme court of Florida, pronounced by the chief-justice, on the question of canvassing the vote of the county of Madison, will be found in the record, page 221.

* * * * * * *

As already stated, duly certified copies of these returns were put in evidence by the contestee; they are signed by all the officers of the election; they are perfect in form, clear and explicit in the statement of the votes cast, and have all been adjudged by the unanimous opinion of the supreme court of Florida, in a case before it, to be good and valid returns of the election at these polls. (17 Florida Rep., page 17.)

Mr. CALKINS was a member of that committee, and under that report another Democrat was turned out by a Democratic House.

Mr. CALKINS drew the report in Boynton vs. Loring, in the Forty-sixth Congress, in which occurred this language:

But it is not necessary for us to decide this question, and we do not, much preferring that the courts of Massachusetts shall first construe their own statutes, and when they have undergone judicial construction we would follow the decisions of the courts of that State.

And this report was signed by all the committee (including Speaker KEIFER) except Mr. Weaver, the Greenbacker.

And the Mr. CALKINS who, as a member of the Committee on Elections of the Forty-sixth Congress did all these things, is the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Elections in this the Forty-seventh Congress, who prepared this majority report, which so vigorously fights against the principles then laid down. Then he was ready to follow State courts in the construction of State election laws freely. Now he puts it thus gingerly:

It need, however, hardly be added that a line of carefully considered cases in the States, in which such courts have undoubted jurisdiction, so far as they would apply in principle, would go a long way toward settling a disputed point of construction in any State election law. In fact it may be said that it would probably be the duty of Congress to follow the settled doctrine thus established. (Report, page 11.)

But seemingly afraid that his last enunciation will not be satisfactory he proceeds further to attack the Mississippi decision. He says that this construction of the statute was obiter dicta, because, by deciding that the commissioners could not be compelled to recanvass the votes of Tunica County, the court could have avoided the decision of the other points. The construction was not obiter even under the citations made by the report. There was a square issue upon each of the questions decided. They were made by a public officer to settle a dispute in which every elector in the State had a direct interest and every elector in the United States had an indirect interest, and the court could not decently pass by any one of them. So avoiding decision of questions, even in ordinary cases, was so great an evil that many States have legislated against the wrong. In Mr. CALKINS's own State since 1851 the constitution has declared: "The supreme court shall, upon the decision of every case, give a statement in writing of each question arising in the record in each case, and the decision of the court thereon." (Constitution of Indiana, 1851, article 7, section 5.)

In 1872 a statute of Georgia enacted that "the court (supreme court) shall decide all questions presented in the record of each case carried up to it for review." (Code 1873, section 4271.) It may be so in many States. And neither in Indiana nor Georgia would the court have any patience with one who would argue that their decision upon any question plainly made in the record was obiter, because it was not necessary to an adjudication of the rights of the parties.

It is not true, as stated by the majority report, that "the court declared in terms it had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter embraced in the first and second grounds stated in the opinion." All it said was:

The House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States is the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and the courts of the State have nothing to do with this matter.

If that fact ousted the court of jurisdiction, what becomes of the position that a "line of well-considered decisions," &c., should be followed? A thousand would not change the fact that at last the House was judge, and that "the courts of the State have nothing to do with this matter." Nor does the majority of the Committee on Elections stand to that doctrine. The Republicans invoke exactly the opposite doctrine in their report in the case of Mackey vs. O'Connor, made on the 10th of April, 1882. Then, in discussing the duty of election officers under the laws of South Carolina, when that election was held, they used this language:

In the election laws of South Carolina, so far as a member of Congress is concerned, there is absolutely nothing authorizing county canvassers to pass upon the validity of an election, and to decide whether or not the votes there cast are to be counted and canvassed. Such is the effect of the decision of the supreme court of that State, Ex parte Mackey et al. ex. Canville et al., rendered upon an appeal taken by the contestant upon an application to one of the circuit judges for the writ of mandamus to compel the county canvassers of Charleston to count the votes of two of the polls rejected by them.

I cite another memorable case. Three years ago Maine was turned over to a Republican governor and Legislature upon a decision of her supreme court made upon a "solemn question" (not case) submitted.

MARKED BALLOTS VOID.

The marked ballots ought not to be counted, even if we proceed regardless of the construction of the Mississippi statute made by her highest judicial tribunal.

Citations of cases as to the general rule of construing election laws are useless here. None will dispute about that. But let us come down to the very question under consideration.

The election law of Indiana, by section 18, requires the voter to receive his ballot and "put the same unopened into the ballot-box," and by section 23 requires that all ballots "shall be written or printed on plain white paper, without any distinguishing marks or other embellishment thereon, except the name of the candidates and the office for which they are voted for, and inspectors of elections shall refuse all ballots offered of any other description; provided nothing herein shall disqualify the voter from writing his own name on the back thereof."

Here the fact that the law compelled the ticket to be voted unopened, without marks or other embellishments thereon, except that the voter might write his name on its back, shows that her courts were right in holding that a mark inside of this unopened ballot, and not seen till the counting of the votes, could not cause the ballot to be then rejected. That the Mississippi statute dealt with the face and not the "back" of the ballot is plain from its words: "All ballots shall be written or printed in black ink," "without any device or mark by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another, except the words at the head of the ticket; but they shall not prohibit the erasure, correction, or insertion of any name by pencil-mark or ink upon the face of the ballot; and a ticket different from that herein prescribed shall not be received nor counted." (Section 137, ante.)

In Commonwealth vs. Woelper, 3 S. & R., 29, the supreme court of Pennsylvania held that such a law must be strictly construed. Tilghman, C. J., delivering the opinion, said:

The tickets in favor of those persons who succeeded in the election had on them the engraving of an eagle. The judge who tried the case charged the jury that these tickets ought not to have been counted. The case is certainly within the words of the law. The tickets had something more than the names on them. But is it within the meaning of the law? I think it is. This engraving might have several ill effects. In the first place, it might be perceived by the inspector, even when folded. This knowledge might possibly influence him in receiving or rejecting the vote. But in the next place, it deprived those persons who did not vote the German ticket of that secrecy which the election by ballot was intended to secure to them. A man who gave in a ticket without an eagle was set down as an anti-German and exposed to the animosity of the party. Another objection is that the symbols of party increase that heat which it is desirable to assuage. We see that at the election some wore eagles in their hats. The case thus falling within the words and practices of this kind leading to inconvenience, I think the court ought not exercise its ingenuity in support of these tickets. Let us at least prevent future altercations at elections by laying down such plain rules for the conduct of inspectors as cannot be mistaken. I am for construing the by-law as it is written and rejecting all tickets that have anything on them more than the names. This objection strikes at the root of the election, for the evidence is that all the tickets in favor of the defendants were stamped with an eagle. Whatever, therefore, may be the law on other points, it is clear, upon the whole, that the defendants were not duly elected.

The law of Oregon required tickets to be written or printed on plain white paper. The officers rejected a ballot because it was on colored paper. Its supreme court, upon a case made, decided thus:

Section 30, page 572, of the code provides that "all ballots used at any election in this State shall be written or printed on a plain white paper without any mark or designation being placed thereon whereby the same may be known or designated." The voter in this instance is conclusively presumed to have had knowledge of this requirement, and to have had it in his power to comply with it by using a proper ballot. It was a matter entirely under his own control, and if he chose to disregard the law he cannot complain if the consequence was that his vote was lost. (The State vs. McKinnon, 8 Oregon, 500.)

Ohio has the identical Mississippi requirements as to tickets except that it does not declare that marked ballots shall not be counted. We might cite other election laws from many States and draw comparisons with them, but as this report is signed by a distinguished lawyer from the State of Massachusetts I call attention to her law. Chapter 7 of the Statutes of Massachusetts, 1882, contains her election laws. By section 4 the secretary of state is required to furnish to all election officers self-sealing envelopes of uniform size and color and bearing the arms of the Commonwealth; and no other envelopes can be used at the polls. By section 9 none but registered persons can vote. By section 12 the vote must be presented by the voter in person "in a sealed envelope, or open and unfolded, and so that such officers can know that only one ballot is presented."

By section 14 no tickets are to be printed or distributed when three or more must be voted for "unless such ballots are of plain white paper, in weight not less than that of ordinary printing-paper, and are not more than 5 nor less than 4½ inches in width, and not more than 12½ nor less than 11½ inches in length, and unless the same are printed with black ink on one side of the paper only, and contain no printing, engraving, device, or mark of any kind upon the back thereof. The names of candidates shall be printed at right angles with the length of the ballot in capital letters not less than one-eighth nor more than one-fourth of an inch in height, and no name of any person appearing upon any ballot as a candidate for any office shall be repeated thereon with respect to the same office. Nothing herein contained shall authorize the refusal to receive or count any ballot for any want of conformity with the requirements of this section." Suppose the last clause stricken out, and in lieu of it the words of the Mississippi statute, "and a ticket different from that herein prescribed shall not be received or counted." Suppose on the back of such tickets (for that law deals with the "backs") were two "monkey dashes" and other "printers' marks," would they not be rejected because obnoxious to the prohibition against "printing, engraving, device, or mark of any kind upon the back thereof?"

On the 1st of March, 1882, the committee on election laws of Massachusetts reported favorably what seemed to be one of a series of intended amendments to her election laws. Its first section was in these words:

No person shall, at an election for the choice of State, district, county, or city officers, cast any ballot unless the same is at least 4½ inches in length and width, and no such ballots shall be received or counted by the election officers.

The officer who sent me the bill says he understands its purpose to be "to provide against the counting of 'stickers' which have fallen from the tickets or ballots to which they were affixed when cast."

But whatever was its purpose, I cite it as another attempt to compel fair elections by strict regulations. And I call attention to language used by the distinguished Representative [Mr. RANNEY] who is a member of the Committee on Elections in this House, on the 17th of this month, in the report in Bisbee vs. Hull. It was this: "It is a fundamental principle as firmly established as any rule of law that votes must be cast as the law directs," and he adds that votes otherwise cast are "illegal and void." The law of Mississippi directed that tickets should not be counted unless they were "without any device or marks by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another, except the words at the head of the ticket." Each of these rejected ballots had on it four different marks, by either or any or all of which they could be known and distinguished, and were known and distinguished from other tickets. Will we violate this fundamental principle that these votes may be counted?

In the contested election case of Curtin vs. Yocum there was a report, (No. 345, second session Forty-sixth Congress.) I believe none dissented from this language in that report:

The authorities are uniform to the effect that all statutes are mandatory which cannot be disregarded without ignoring the legislative intent. The will of the Legislature cannot be carried out unless the provision of the statute is complied with, and to disregard one of the safeguards which the law-making power of Pennsylvania deemed necessary for the protection of the ballot. (Page 4.)

The same rule is well expressed in Doerflinger vs. Hilmantel, 21 Wisconsin. The statute forbade unregistered voters from voting, and declared the votes to be illegal. The court said:

The inspectors cannot receive his vote, and if they cannot it cannot afterward be received and counted by the courts. And next it is to be observed that it is a negative statute. It has been said on very high authority that negative words will make a statute imperative. (Dwarris on Statutes, 715; 7 Law Library, 55, and cases cited.) The words of the act are: "No vote shall be received at any annual election in this State unless," &c. It is difficult to conceive any language more strongly imperative than this.

THE MAJORITY CONFESSES AND AVOIDS.

The only reply by the majority report, is (page 13:)

In the present case we find, as a matter of fact, that there was no intentional violation of the law, and we further find, as a matter of fact, that every precaution was taken which a reasonably prudent man would be likely to take under similar circumstances; that the contestant in person applied to those whom he might reasonably believe to be well versed in the art of printing, and, with the law in their hands, discussed the question of distinguishing marks, and was assured that tickets would be prepared and printed strictly within the letter of the statute. After the tickets were printed the contestant was assured that they were lawful, and might be relied upon as not being obnoxious to the law. It does not appear that the printers' dashes which appear on the ticket were observed by the contestant or his friends, at least until the morning of the election, after they were all distributed, and it was too late to furnish other tickets; and when the dashes were discovered it was stoutly contended that they were not distinguishing marks within the meaning of the law. It also appears that there was no intention on the part of any one, either those connected with the printing of them, or those for whose use they were designed, to print the dashes in the tickets for the purpose of distinguishing them from any other ballots of any other party.

It is also proved that tickets precisely similar to those that are questioned in this contest, in so far as the printers' dashes are concerned, were printed and furnished to the opposing party in at least one of the counties in the sixth Congressional district of Mississippi, and were unquestionably voted without a suspicion that they were obnoxious to the law.

That the marks were used to distinguish the tickets appears by the record. Luther Reed, a farmer, forty-four years old, and an election commissioner of Warren, testified that he and his fellow-commissioners unanimously rejected all marked ballots, where protests against them were filed because they thought them illegal. In testifying as to occurrences at the election, he said, "I saw a squad of colored men standing together, and heard some say, 'these are the marks which I vote by.'" (Objected by the contestant's counsel as hearsay.) Cross-examination continued: "I saw the tickets, but I did not go near enough to see what tickets they were." One of them said, "I voted the 'O' ticket." (Record, page 40–41, and see ticket on page 139 of record.) H. M. Marshall testified as to the election in Warren County, as follows:

Question 4. Did, or not, the Republican officers or challengers at the polls keep a tally of the votes for Lynch and announce the state of the vote when the polls closed and before the votes were counted? A. Yes; Captain Bourne kept a tally, and at the close of the polls announced the result; which, when the votes were counted, hit the exact result or nearly so. (Record, 250.)

The Republican challenger at Kingston precinct, Adams County, Henry B. Towers, testified:

Out of the 350 which I have on my tally-sheet I actually saw and read the name of Lynch on 160 ballots, the balance I took by what the voters said. (Record, 133.) The voters were instructed to turn their tickets toward me as they came into the voting-room. (Record, 137.)

Away with your talk about a secret ballot, an unmarked ballot, when thus your voters are marched to the polls "like dumb driven cattle!"

Nor can the committee escape upon the idea that the voters did not see these tickets till the morning of the election. That objection would be just as valid with any kind of marks on the tickets, as spread-eagles or the like. This contest is not with the voters, but with Lynch. The statute of the United States treats it solely as a case between Lynch and Chalmers. Now, what had he to do with preparing these marked ballots? We stop not to notice that he told the secretary of state that all his tickets were printed at one office, &c., (record, 259,) while the fact was that he employed two offices to do the work. Grant that he was misunderstood, as he claims. (Read at pages 45, 46, 47, 49, 51, 52.) From them it will appear that he had the law and had the proof-sheets of the Democratic ticket and his own before him side by side; he criticised the difference in the type of "heading," and that he swears on the trial that he regarded the utter absence of marks on the Democratic ticket as a device by which they might be known. He thought obedience to the letter of the law a violation of the law.

The record contains no evidence that Mr. Chalmers had any marked tickets made or saw any before they were voted. The record, at pages 42, 43, shows that the chairman of the Democratic executive committee of Issaquena County by letter ordered "2,000 regular Republican tickets, Garfield and Arthur, and electors, but with our candidate for Congress, Hon. James R. Chalmers's name at bottom." And he received them, but the record does not show that any of them were used, I believe.

More than a thousand years before Christ Saul was told to go and destroy the Amalekites, to destroy utterly all of them. He went and brought back the captive Agag and sheep and oxen, and he was called to account by the prophet for his neglect of duty. I can almost see him as he replied: "Why, I brought the king a captive. Have you no pride as an Israelite? And the people have brought back the best of the sheep and the oxen for sacrifice. Do you not believe in sacrifice?" The stern answer was: "To obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams."

And shall we be told in this presence, by the law-makers, that laws made, not in the South alone but all over this country—for they are alike—for the purpose of preserving the purity of elections are to be set aside at pleasure? If so, where are you to stop? Would it be permissible to put a black line around this ticket as a symbol of mourning for Garfield? Would it have been permissible to print the face of Lincoln thereon and say "He was the emancipator of the negro race?" Obedience to law shows a plain path; disobedience places you at sea, and God only knows where you will find harbor.

I find, Mr. Speaker, that I will not have time to discuss the certificates of the supervisors, &c., and it is best to leave that to others. But I will attach here as part of my remarks the appendix to one of the arguments before the committee, showing what was said at the time of the passage of the law touching the right of supervisors in county precincts to make returns. I know that with lawyers remarks prior to its passage about what a law means do not always amount to a great deal. But it does seem that in this place and in this presence they are considered.

Mr. RANNEY. Not in the courts.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. As the gentleman from Massachusetts properly remarks, not in courts. In this place we have had a treaty, "the highest law," as Mr. Webster calls it, absolutely twisted from its meaning, as Congress understood it, by a veto, because of prior talk between the Americans and Chinamen who negotiated the same. Surely, therefore, Garfield's construction of the supervisory law will go down with us to-day. Here is the appendix:

APPENDIX.

When the sundry civil bill of the Forty-second Congress went to the Senate an amendment known as the tenth amendment was put on, extending the law as to supervisors of election to all Congressional districts alike. This was resisted by the House, and after an excited and angry contention between the two Houses a compromise was made providing for the appointment of supervisors in Congressional districts outside of cities of 20,000 inhabitants, but limiting their power as follows:

"And provided further, That the supervisors herein provided for shall have no power or authority to make arrests or to perform other duties than to be in the immediate presence of the officers holding the election and to witness all their proceedings, including the counting of the votes and the making of a return thereof."

Mr. Garfield, chairman of the committee, when making the conference report, said:

"The effect of this is that the supervisors authorized by this act stand by and witness the proceedings of the election, and have the official right to stand by, so that if frauds are being perpetrated the Government of the United States may have as witnesses a member of the Democratic party and one of the Republican party to the facts in the case." (See Congressional Globe, page 4455, second session, Forty-second Congress.)

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Let me suggest to my colleague whether the effect of this amendment may not be to deprive these officers of the power to challenge, and also of the power to make the certificate which they now make under the existing law? I call the attention of my colleague to these words: "shall have no power or authority to make arrests, or to perform other duties than to be in the immediate presence of the officers holding the elections," &c. It seems to me, and I suggest it as an apprehension, that this strips these supervisors or inspectors of the power both of challenge and also of indorsing the certificates of election.

Mr. GARFIELD. That may be true; but, even if it be true, the presence of these officers, appointed by a judge, acts as a moral challenge.

Mr. BROOKS. I understand that they have not the power to give certificates of election.

Mr. GARFIELD. I should say clearly not.

Mr. BROOKS. Nor have they any power to make any return.

Mr. GARFIELD. Nothing of the kind. (Page 4454.)

Mr. GOODRICH. My question is whether the present amendment does not clearly retain to the supervisors appointed by the General Government, through the instrumentality of the court, the duty and the right to make a return or certificate of election contrary to and in opposition to the State officer?

Mr. KERR. Under the language of that amendment I think it is perfectly clear, as a question of law, that these two supervising witnesses will have neither right nor authority to sign or to superintend, or in any way to modify or to change the returns of the election. They may merely stand and see how it is conducted.

Mr. GOODRICH. Now I desire to have that proviso read to the House.

Clerk read as follows:

"And provided further, That the supervisors herein provided for shall have no power or authority to make arrests or to perform other duties than to be in the immediate presence of the officers holding the election and to witness all their proceedings, including the counting of the votes and the making of a return thereof."

Mr. GOODRICH. That is it, "and to make a return."

Mr. GARFIELD. Oh, no; that is not it. [Laughter.] They only witness the making of the return.

There are here also certificates of clerks of chancery courts, &c. Now, there is no law in Mississippi that authorizes any clerk to have anything on the face of this earth to do with an election except that the clerk of the circuit court keeps the book of registration and changes the registration where parties move, &c.; and he delivers that poll-book to the commissioners when an election is to be held, and they return that poll-book to him after it is held. I challenge gentlemen who shall conclude upon me to show one word in their statutes enlarging their powers beyond that. I may be mistaken, but that is the way I understand her law. That being true, how do you get such a certificate as evidence here? I read from a standard work on election cases. It is Rogers's Law and Practice of Elections and Election Committees, published in 1837, an English book. On page 84 the principle is laid down thus:

The general rules which apply to evidence in the courts of law apply also to evidence before a committee of the House of Commons. The same witness who, from want of understanding, defect of religious principle, or infamy of character, is incompetent in the one place must necessarily be so in the other. So, also, the policy which forbids husband and wife from giving evidence either for or against each other, and which considers as sacred the communications made to counsel or solicitor, are rules of law inviolably to be preserved in all tribunals. It is therefore unnecessary to treat at any length on such points in a work like the present, though some of them are incidentally noticed hereafter.

On page 117 is this language:

It is a general rule of evidence that the burden of proof lies on the person who has to support his case by proof of a fact of which he is supposed to be cognizant. Upon this principle it has been held that where a class of voters seeks the benefit of exemptions, they must show that they are legally entitled to the benefit of them.

It is always necessary that the best evidence should be given which the nature of the thing admits of. The true meaning of this rule is that inferior evidence shall not be received when, from the nature of the thing, better evidence may be presumed to be in a party's possession or power.—Ibid, 117.

On page 119 it is said:

The committee resolved that, in the absence of the poll-book, parol evidence could not be admitted.

On page 121:

Coleraine, P. & K., 508: A list of freemen prepared by a former chamberlain in obedience to an order of the house, but not returned to the house; and a return to the house of the names of the freemen, with the dates of their admissions, made by the present chamberlain, from information derived from the corporation books, held to be inadmissible.

On page 122:

So, also, a certificate of the registry of a deed was rejected as not being the best evidence, the deed not being proved to be lost.—2 Peck, 137.

The proceedings are as closely assimilated as the nature of the subject will admit to that which usually takes place at the trial of another at law in the ordinary courts.—Cushing's Parliamentary Reports, 269, section 657.

The rules concerning the admissibility of evidence have been established chiefly with a view to those tribunals where the department of trying the facts of causes and of expounding and deciding upon the law are intrusted to different persons. When those two provinces center in the same judges, as in election committees, the same strictness hardly seems to be necessary. * * * The law supposes committees to be acquainted with the nature of legal evidence, and therefore it must be presumed that if they do admit evidence which, when they hear it, turns out to be illegal, they will lay no stress upon it in forming their verdict. Juries, on the contrary, by intendment of law are considered as unacquainted with the nature of legal evidence. (Notes to the Cardigan Case, 3 Doug., 231, 232, 1775.)—Wordsworth's Election Reports, 36; published in 1834.

I mention those as examples of the rigidity of the rule in England. Now, what is our statute on the subject? I do not care to inquire as to the statute of Mississippi, but take the statutes of the United States. Under them this trial is had. First, it must be a certificate by "the keeper of the said records or books." This is section 906, applying to anything but court records. And it must be under his seal of office; and to that must bear the attestation of a judge that it is in due form; and there shall be a further authentication by the clerk or prothonotary—

Who shall certify under his hand and the seal of his office that the said presiding justice is duly commissioned and qualified; or if given by such governor's secretary, chancellor, or keeper of the great seal, it shall be under the great seal of the State, Territory, or country aforesaid in which it is made.

Now, there is no such evidence in this case, and the committee would not act upon the informal, illegal certificates. And I only mention it now because the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE] yesterday seemed to think it was necessary to fight the committee on these propositions. I suppose he felt that the committee could not get along on their report and needed help by his running on the outside.

I will remark in passing that this side has not shown a very great respect for the reports of committees on that side. But ordinarily we have paid some attention to what their committees have said. It is true that the other day, upon a unanimous report touching the better government of the city of Washington, one or two of the leaders of the other side of the House attacked it fiercely, and one dared to say in his place, when reminded that it was a report from a committee on his own side, "And we rebuke our committee."

Now, gentlemen, when you treat your own committees in that way, you cannot expect us to have so great confidence in them as we might otherwise have.

Now I will allude to some remarks of yesterday made by another gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MOORE.] I will state first that the general tone of his speech was an arraignment not only of the State of Mississippi but of the whole South, of every part of the country where there are colored voters. His idea was that there was no honest election simply because Democrats were returned from districts where there were more colored men than white men.

That I believe is a fair statement of his argument. He produced statistics of the district of Mr. Chalmers, and from those statistics he argued that a colored man ought to be here instead of Mr. Chalmers. I do not think that logic good. If it be good, then Mr. Shaw ought to be here instead of Mr. Moore, from Memphis, for Shaw was a colored gentleman who desired to come to Congress from that district, and the district has more colored voters than white voters. Yet when his name is presented Moore says, "Oh, Shaw, it will not do, [laughter;] I want it." He is as kind about giving away other people's places as was Artemus Ward about sending his wife's relations to the war. [Laughter.]

I do not wish to answer the gentleman by mere talk about what the condition of the South is, for he would say it was a Bourbon's evidence, but I will read from authority on his own side, from the reports of the Attorney-Generals of the United States as to the condition of the South. I will read first from the report of Attorney-General Devens, made in December, 1879. He says:

It has been my effort resolutely and fairly to execute all of the laws of the United States protecting the purity of elections, in the same way that other laws are executed, and to bring to justice those who have violated them.

Some addition to the expenses of the Department have been made by the prosecution of offenses committed against these laws by various forms of intimidation and fraud, the more prominent of which latter was the offense familiarly known as "ballot-box stuffing." While convictions have not been obtained in as many cases as could have been desired, I have known of none which was commenced without proper and sufficient evidence to justify them. The number of convictions obtained in the various States, however, authorizes the belief that a more healthy sentiment is developing itself against offenses of this character. That they strike at the very foundation of republican government cannot be disputed.

Now, what did he mean? That the number of convictions at that time satisfied him that there was a more healthy state of public opinion? I have taken pains to collate from the reports of the Attorney-Generals for the last six years all the acquittals, convictions, and nolleprossed in all the States of the Union under the election laws. Let us look first at the year 1879. How many convictions were there during that year? There were forty; and there were thirty acquittals and seventy-six cases nolleprossed. Where were the convictions? There were two in Alabama, four in Connecticut, six in Florida, seventeen in Maryland, five in New York, three in New Jersey, one in Virginia, one in Louisiana, and none in Mississippi.

In 1880, after another election had been held, and when the Attorney-General, like the gentleman from Tennessee, was gathering his facts from newspapers, he wrote a tirade on the subject of the violation of the election laws, and urged that they should be enforced. (See his report, pages 16–17.) (No mention of the matter occurs in his last report.) What was the enforcement? With the power of the Government in his own hands, with officers of his own, and with juries fixed to suit the purpose, so far as they could be according to the law, what were the convictions then? They mounted up pretty largely; Mississippi got fifty-two of them in a year; Texas had thirty-nine; New York, forty; Connecticut, four; Kentucky, one; Missouri, three; Pennsylvania, two; South Carolina, one; Ohio, two, &c.

Now to what was that due? You have seen it stated here that ad interim there was a change in the laws of the country. This statute of Mississippi was passed in 1880; its construction was uncertain. These men were indicted at a time when the passions engendered by the strife of the election had not been cooled down.

They went to court, and they said, practically, "You indicted us for not doing our duty. We did our duty as we understood it. Perhaps technically we violated the law and committed a crime, but it involves no moral turpitude, and no man dares charge us with anything of that kind. If you put it upon a mere technicality that we violated the law, that is true and we plead guilty."

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 8, 1882.

SIR: In reply to an inquiry contained in letter of Representative CHALMERS to you of 29th January, I have to say that within the three years that I have been attorney of the northern district of Mississippi only two cases have been prosecuted against citizens of the sixth Congressional district of Mississippi in the Federal court of my district, namely: United States vs. M. B. Collins, Warner Mathews, and James E. Monroe, for returning the vote of one precinct as the vote of Coahoma County at the Congressional election of 1880; and they entered the plea of nolo contendere, and were fined a nominal amount; and United States vs. Dr. Coleman, for stuffing ballot-box at same election, who also filed the same plea, and was subjected to small fine.

Very respectfully,

G. C. CHANDLER,
United States Attorney.

Hon. B. H. BREWSTER, Attorney-General.

What was the fine? I have the official statement from the Attorney-General of every one of them. There is but one in the lot who was charged with stuffing a ballot-box or with anything else than failure to comply with the election laws. Every man of them was acquitted on trial, except four, and they were fined $50 each. I insert here the table which I made and the report furnished from the Attorney-General's Office:

Now, let us look a little further into that matter. How was it easier to make convictions in the South then, even if we have to account for it on other principles? The Attorney-General, in his report for 1879, on page 14, on the subject of witnesses, calls attention to the law allowing witnesses to be subpœnaed for criminals and to be paid by the United States, (Revised Statutes, section 878;) and he adds the following:

A great expenditure is thrown upon the Government by this provision, as large numbers of witnesses are often summoned on behalf of defendants whose presence is apparently not necessary to a fair trial of the case, and there certainly has been much abuse of this privilege, which necessarily entails a large loss upon the Government. I respectfully suggest that it might well be considered whether (except in capital cases) the number of witnesses which the United States shall be required to summon and pay for a defendant should exceed four, and also whether these should be permitted thus to be summoned unless it is reasonably shown that their testimony is to go to the merits of the case.

In 1880 he thought it important to repeat that recommendation, and to add this language:

It should be thoroughly guarded; and no witness should be allowed to be summoned merely for the purpose of attesting or attacking the credibility of other witnesses, which is one of the most frequent modes of multiplying such witnesses.

True, Mr. Speaker, this is only a recommendation to Congress to pass such a law; but be it said to the honor of the representatives of the people they have differed with the Attorney-General as to the propriety of such legislation. The same request is repeated in the last report, that of 1881; yet no member of this House has thought of introducing a bill to carry out that recommendation. And yet its repetition serves almost as an order to Federal judges. I know not what are the provisions in other States, but in my own State when a man is indicted he can summon as a witness any man he chooses for any purpose without disclosing to the judge or the prosecuting attorney what he expects to prove. It is certainly hard enough, as that report said, that section 878, Revised Statutes, "gives to persons indicted in the courts of the United States an advantage which few, if any, of the States confer. If any person so indicted makes affidavit setting forth that there are witnesses material to his defense, that he cannot safely go to trial without them, what he expects to prove by each of them, &c., and that he is not possessed of sufficient means to enable him to pay the expenses of such witnesses, the courts, or any judge thereof in vacation, may order such witnesses, if found within the limits of the district in which the court is held, or within one hundred miles of the place of trial, to be subpœnaed. In such case the costs incurred by the service of process and fees of witnesses are paid in the same manner that similar costs and fees are paid where witnesses are subpœnaed on behalf of the United States."

He must disclose his defense before trial, before he shall have a subpœna. But I submit it would be a very severe rule to say to a man, "Although you may be indicted at the instance of a man who is unworthy of belief, a man whose character places him outside the pale of decent society, and are too poor to pay your own witness fees, you shall not produce witnesses to prove that he is such a man, because it costs the Government a little money."

Here we are day by day rolling out our rhetoric and frowning at the grand old British lion, saying that we will spend millions rather than have a citizen improperly imprisoned in a British jail; yet we have the Attorney-General saying in 1879, and reiterating it—I think without proper consideration—even in the last official report, in effect, "Imprison as many of our own people as you please, not at home, but away off in the cold regions of Albany, in the penitentiary, for the violation of election laws, though it be upon the oaths of men who are infamous, because the Government objects to paying witness fees even for her citizens indicted, and who swear to their inability to get witnesses because of poverty."

Against the talk of the newspapers, against the abuse which the gentleman from Tennessee bestows upon the people among whom he lives, I present the official statement and the official fact to show that he has slandered his countrymen.

It will not do for gentlemen to say that the officers of the law are not honest. They are your officers. It will not do to say you cannot convict. The records show that you have convicted. There is but one honest way to look at this thing; that is, to look at the records of your courts in the South as you look at them everywhere else; giving them full faith and credit. Assume that it may be true that just after an election many charges may be made, and that when the excitement has cooled the prosecuting officers may discover that there is no proper foundation for the actions they have instituted, and may quash the indictments.

Do not brand the officers of your own choosing, your prosecuting attorneys and your judges, with baseness, but look at the record and find that during six years there have been one hundred and thirty-one acquittals, and four hundred and sixty-six nolleprosses to two hundred and forty-eight convictions, and the conviction in almost every case has been under some local law, some special arrangement, some plea that did not affect the honor of the court, nor of the defendants, but preserved the forms of justice. While speaking of the proceedings in Texas I forgot to state that in all those cases the offense was purely technical, and the judge fined the parties one dollar a piece.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOORE] started out yesterday with this language:

> Before proceeding to the discussion of this case, with all deference and respect for the older and wiser members of our party who think differently—

That was put in for politeness—

> I wish now and here to enter my solemn protest against the shilly-shally, pig-and-puppy policy of our managers, if we have any on our side of the House.

Now, it is not my business to defend the other side of the House, but I have some friends over there, and I will remark, without further controversy, that the gentleman from Tennessee ought not to have said that; it was a little more than was deserved. He adds:

> We have a number of Republicans here, who know themselves to have been lawfully elected to seats upon this floor—

The Constitution, as the majority of the committee say in their report, makes us the judges in a case of this kind, even above the courts; but the gentleman from Tennessee makes the contestants the judges—makes Mr. Lynch the judge in this case. They know "they ought to have their seats." He says:

> We have a number of Republicans here who know themselves to have been lawfully elected to seats upon this floor, now and for nearly five months past entreating this Republican House to give them an opportunity to present their claims for consideration.

Then he goes on:

> But when our own party friends, from whom we have a reasonable right to at least expect some sort of sympathy, deliberately decline from day to day to allow us to bring up the claims of these neglected associates, we think we have a just and valid right to feel deeply aggrieved.

"We!" That is Mr. Lynch & Co.; not the Republican party, not the country.

> We have three contesting members whose cases, after many months of investigation, are now ready to be presented to this House with favorable reports, prepared with such care and cautious investigation as will commend them, we trust, to the judgment and sense of right of every fair man in this House and in this country. We insist now upon their right to be heard. The Republicans of the South, they who have come up through great tribulation—

Without their garments being spotless—> will not longer excuse the party for this dangerous and unjust neglect of the highest privileges of these Representatives, namely, the right to occupy and possess their lawful but now usurped seats upon this floor.

> Mr. Speaker, I shall make no threats. I have for twenty years voted and shall continue to vote the Republican ticket, no matter at what personal cost, and that cost is well known to many; but all other men are not so ingrained as I am into the principles of the Republican party; and I warn this Congress to-day and the whole country that unless they do simple justice, and do it reasonably soon, to these Republican contestants who have almost literally fought their way to the doors of this House, it will require no prophetic foresight to see the Forty-eighth Congress in the hands of a round Bourbon majority and led by a Bourbon President.
> I confess that I am, and I think the country is, growing very impatient with the milk-sop policy of our Republican majority here, and unless we decide soon to first seat the men who have been fairly and honestly elected, and then go on vigorously in the prosecution of the important public business for which we were sent here, I do not hesitate to say that the country will not do what it ought to do if it fails to repudiate our party at the very next election. A word to the wise is sufficient.

Here is a man representing an important district and proclaiming himself the champion of 6,000,000 of colored people, who stands here in this House, where every member is under oath, and says to members of his party: "If you dare to vote as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] said you ought to vote, on your conscience and your judgment, you may expect a Democratic majority in the Forty-eighth Congress."

Talk about party lash! The meanest slave-driver that ever disgraced the South did not dare to put the lash so hardly upon the back of his meanest slave.

I know not what the honorable gentleman is, or what his views are, except as I gather them from his speech. In the Directory he remarks simply he was elected over Casey Young, I suppose thinking that was quite glory enough to die on. But in his speech he demonstrates to us that he is not a lawyer; indeed he says so, and the bar will be as gratified in learning that as will the public in learning another thing, that he is not. This speech would indicate he was a very cruel man, a very harsh man. That is not so. He is sleek and fat and good-natured, a very gentleman in manner and a very gentleman in thought, no doubt. He does not mean what he says in his speech. What private grievance he has I know not, but I cannot believe the gentleman in earnest.

When I was a boy, raised in a village, the first time I went to a city I was greatly alarmed at a savage I saw upon the side-walk, with tomahawk in hand, feathers in his cap, and a scalp in his belt. Seeing me alarmed, a friend led me quietly up to it and said: "Why, this is not a savage; tap it, look at it; it is simply made of block tin, painted, and perfectly hollow. There is no danger in it whatever." [Laughter and applause.]

I mention that so the country in reading this speech may know that the gentleman was joking. I mention it seriously, Mr. Speaker, because of his importance in this House. Think of him standing on the mighty river where is his home, with his back to Tennessee, North Carolina, and Virginia. He has no eyes in the back of his head; he turns his back on them thinking they are safe. He casts his eye out over Arkansas and Texas. To his right hand are Missouri and Kentucky. To his left are poor, prostrate Mississippi, Louisiana, and Alabama. To them he speaks, and as the waters bear his voice down toward the mouth of the Mississippi River it is caught up by the Gulf Stream, and skirting the coast of Florida and of Georgia, South Carolina and Hatteras, on up to the North and away over to the downtrodden people of Europe, this man's voice, the champion of the downtrodden everywhere, the champion of those whose rights are neglected, rolls on in mighty volume. I regret it, but I am obliged to tell the world that he is only a champion in disguise; he is posing. [Laughter and applause.]

[During the delivery of Mr. HAMMOND's remarks, before his hour had expired, he said: I should like to know at this point, in order that I may properly shape the remarks which I desire to address to the House, whether at the expiration of my hour I may calculate on being allowed ten or fifteen minutes more if necessary.

Mr. ROBESON. I will move, if that be necessary, to give the gentleman from Georgia fifteen minutes additional.

Mr. CALKINS. And even if the House should not consent to that, I will state to the gentleman that at the close of his hour I will take the floor and yield him fifteen minutes.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I am obliged to the gentleman from Indiana for his courtesy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] asks unanimous consent that the hour of the gentleman from Georgia be extended fifteen minutes.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I hope I shall not need that extension, and yet I do not know but I may.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the request which has been made, and the time of the gentleman from Georgia is extended for fifteen minutes.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia, then resumed and concluded his remarks.]

Mr. CALKINS. I now ask the contestant be heard.

There was no objection; and it was so ordered.

Mr. LYNCH (the contestant) rose. [Applause.]

Mr. MOULTON. I ask that order be preserved in the galleries.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order.

Mr. LYNCH, (the contestant.) Mr. Speaker, in presenting this case to the House and to the country I will not discuss the legal questions that are involved; nor will I review the testimony that has been taken. These points have been and will be forcibly presented by members of the committee who have familiarized themselves with the case. I will content myself with calling public attention to the disreputable system of elections of which the pending case is a natural and necessary outgrowth.

Out of 21,143 votes polled the contestee actually received about 5,000. In the counties of Adams, Claiborne, Jefferson, Washington, and Wilkinson something over 5,000 votes were counted and returned for him that were polled against him. Giving him the benefit of these frauds, he was still defeated by a majority of 663. His pretended claim to the seat is based upon the action of election commissioners or county returning boards in several counties in throwing out over 5,000 Republican tickets that had been received, counted, and returned by the precinct inspectors. Over 3,000 of these tickets were thrown out for the alleged reason that the election officers failed to comply with some technical requirements of the law; such, for instance, as a failure on the part of the election clerks to send up with the returns a list of the names of those who voted.

WARREN COUNTY.

In Warren County all of the Republican tickets except those polled in the first ward of the city of Vicksburgh were thrown out, for the alleged reason that they had on their face the usual and ordinary printers' dashes, which the contestee claimed to be a distinguishing mark. The rejection of these tickets was the most disgraceful act in the whole questionable business. Warren County, which includes the city of Vicksburgh, is the county and city in which General Chalmers now claims to live and where he is presumed to be well, if not favorably known. Although the election machinery in Warren, as in all the other counties in the district, was in the hands of his partisan friends and supporters, but where, I am pleased to be able to say, the election was fair and the count honest, up to the time the returns were made to the county commissioners, the county gave a majority of 1,052 against him. No one supposed for a moment that the commissioners could be induced or even seduced into committing this great outrage, especially as the precinct inspectors had positively refused to reject these tickets in spite of the appeals that were made to them to do so.

But General Chalmers, who seems to be equal to any emergency when his personal interests are at stake, appeared before this board in the person of his law partner, and without notice to his opponent, without allowing the other side an opportunity to take exceptions to the jurisdiction of the board or to present the other side of the question on the merits of the case, insisted upon the commission, without delay, of this great wrong, although they had ten days under the law in which to make their returns to the secretary of state. The opinion is prevalent in Warren County to-day that this board of election commissioners, which consisted of three men of only ordinary intelligence, would not have committed this outrage upon popular suffrage, as one of them frankly admitted to me, had both sides of the question been presented at the time. But the contestee, through his law partner, made them believe that it was their sworn duty to act exactly in accordance with his advice and agreeably to his instructions. In fact it can be truly said that he virtually decided the case himself; and as his modesty is not equal to his ambition, it is perhaps not strange that he decided the case in his own favor.

But there is another fact in support of the assertion that the commissioners acted agreeably to instructions furnished from General Chalmers's law office. The result of the election in the first ward of the city of Vicksburgh was as follows: Chalmers, 168; Lynch, 57. The 57 Republican tickets polled in that ward were exactly like those that were declared by the commissioners to be unlawful, and yet these 57 tickets were declared to be lawful and were therefore counted and returned as such. If all of the other tickets voted by the Republicans in the county were unlawful on account of the printers' dashes, then these were unlawful also, for they were all exactly alike. When the commissioners were asked why they did not throw these out also, their answer was because they were not protested against. The reason they were not protested against is no doubt due to the fact that the contestee had a large majority in that ward. The charge, therefore, made by the Vicksburgh Herald, the ablest Democratic paper published in the State, that the Republican tickets in that county were not thrown out because they had a few printers' dashes on them, but because they did not have the name of Chalmers on them, is unquestionably true. The assertion that the illiterate Republican voters were enabled to distinguish the tickets of the two parties by these dashes is untrue, because every ward in the city and every precinct in the county was supplied with counterfeit Republican tickets, the only difference between the genuine and counterfeit Republican tickets was that the latter had the name of Chalmers instead of Lynch on them for Congress. The printers' dashes, therefore, could not possibly operate to the disadvantage of Mr. Chalmers.

RACE PREJUDICE.

In reading one of Gath's letters to the Cincinnati Enquirer shortly after the election of 1880, I saw the following:

> The Tribune interviewed General Chalmers, of Mississippi, yesterday, who coolly said: "I think about 5,000 votes for Lynch were thrown out in the district, out of 15,000 in all. As self-preservation is the first law of nature, I am in favor of using every means short of violence to preserve the intelligent white people of Mississippi in supreme control of political affairs. They are justified in using every means that wit or money, short of open bribery, can procure. If this is Chalmerism," he concluded, "I am proud of it."

The words "short of violence" and "short of open bribery" were no doubt used for purposes of embellishment and smooth reading. The facts would have been more accurately stated, as expressive of the purposes and methods of the element of which that gentleman is a recognized exponent, had these qualifying words been omitted. But the language the gentleman is reported to have used, as quoted above, is hardly less than a libel upon the most intelligent and respectable white people of Mississippi. That General Chalmers is authorized to speak for the Bourbons of Mississippi, I unhesitatingly admit. That he is authorized to speak for the conservative white people of Mississippi, I most emphatically deny. That he does not and has not expressed their feelings, sentiments, and wishes, either in his utterances or methods, I most positively assert. No one, I presume, will deny that whenever there is a conflict between wealth and intelligence upon the one side and poverty and ignorance upon the other, the former can always wield a controlling influence, or at least hold the latter within legitimate bounds, and that too without resorting to any lawless or questionable means for that purpose. Whenever fraud and violence are resorted to, upon the plea that they are necessary to prevent the ascendency of ignorance over intelligence, the impression that is naturally created upon the public mind is that the order of intelligence is either very inferior or else there is no antagonism or conflict between these elements.

I deny that race prejudice has anything to do with fraud and violence at elections in the Southern States. There is not half as much race feeling at the South as many of the Bourbon leaders of that section would have the country believe. The antagonisms that exist there to-day are not based on antipathies of race, but they are based on antipathies of parties. The race feeling was strong shortly after the war, but it has now very nearly died out. Colored men are not now persecuted in the section from which I come on account of their color, but Republicans, white and colored, are persecuted in many localities on account of their politics. More colored than white men are thus persecuted, simply because they constitute in larger numbers the opposition to the Democratic party. The opposition to me as the candidate of the Republican party for Congress was no more intense than it would have been had the Republicans nominated an aristocrat of the ante-bellum period who fought on the side of the confederacy during the late war. The barrier to my success was not due to my color; it was due to my politics.

Bruce, Douglass, Langston, or any other reputable colored man, as the candidate of the Republican party for the Presidency in 1880, would have come just as near carrying Mississippi as did General Garfield. The Southern Bourbons are simply determined not to tolerate honest differences of opinion upon political questions. They make no distinction between those who have the courage, the manhood, and the independence to array themselves in opposition to Bourbon methods and measures. It matters not what name the opposition may assume nor of what elements it may be composed. They may call themselves Republicans, or Greenbackers as in some localities, or Independents as in others, or Readjusters as in Virginia. The fact that they oppose the ascendency of Bourbon Democracy makes them, from a Bourbon stand-point, enemies to the South, to its interests and to its people. All that is needed at the South to-day is the inculcation of a just and liberal public sentiment which will destroy political proscription and intolerance. That being done a full vote, a free ballot, and a fair count will necessarily follow, for it is an indisputable fact that fraud and violence have, as the basis of their existence, proscription and intolerance. [Applause.]

THE SOLID SOUTH.

That the South is solidly Democratic at the expense of the purity of elections is no longer a disputed question. Every intelligent man knows it and every candid man admits it. Many of those who defend the methods of Southern Bourbons, do so upon the plea that wealth and intelligence ought not to be governed by poverty and ignorance, and, as the wealth and the intelligence of the South are identified with the Democratic party, and the poverty and ignorance with the Republican party, it necessarily follows that Democratic success is essential to the ascendency of the intelligent and property-owning classes. According to their reasoning, therefore, the country ought to countenance and justify fraud and violence on their part. Let us inquire into this a little. The claim that the Democratic party at the South embraces within its membership all of the wealth and the intelligence of that section has not the slightest foundation in fact. I know whereof I speak when I assert that the opposition to the Democratic organization, in the State of Mississippi for instance, embraces within its membership a large per cent. of the wealth, the intelligence, and the moral worth of that Commonwealth. It is equally true that the Democratic party embraces within its membership some of the most ignorant and depraved of our population.

True, the Republican party at the South has a larger percentage of the illiterate voters than has the Democratic party, but it is also true that both parties contain a sufficient number of each of these classes to prevent either from being accepted as the exclusive representative of either class. Under the existing order of things it is impossible to make wealth and intelligence the basis of party organization in any one of the Southern States. If it be true that the Democratic organization at the South is the exclusive representative of the wealth and the intelligence of that section, why is it they do not establish by law an educational or a property qualification for electors? I think I can inform the country why it is they have attempted nothing of the kind. It is because they know they cannot disfranchise the illiterate Republican voter without disfranchising at the same time and in the same way the illiterate Democratic voter. It is because they know they cannot disfranchise the poverty-stricken Republican voter without disfranchising at the same time and in the same way the poverty-stricken Democratic voter. This is the "self-preservation" which they consider to be the "first law of nature."

I admit that a much larger number of Republican than Democratic voters would be thus disfranchised, but a sufficient number of Democrats would be disfranchised to create a public sentiment which would destroy the Democratic organization and drive the party from power. As to that party being the exclusive representative of political morality, the facts presented in this case have gone far to disprove that claim. I assert with feelings of deep mortification and profound regret that in the official person of the contestee in this case the country is presented with a living monument of rifled ballot-boxes, stifled public justice, and a prostituted suffrage. Although the gentleman has occupied a seat upon this floor during the last five years, yet no one knows better than he does himself that he has never, with possibly one exception, 1878, when the Republicans made no organized opposition, received as many as one-third of the votes polled at any election at which he was a candidate. With all of their boasted intelligence and independence it is an unfortunate fact that Southern Democrats are particularly noted for their subserviency to party leadership. They rely chiefly upon their party leaders and local newspapers for political instruction and direction and they generally do or allow to be done whatever their leaders and party papers advise, whether it be right or wrong, fair or unfair. Under these circumstances it can be truly alleged that the contestee in this case is more responsible for the frauds and outrages that were committed in his behalf and for his benefit than any one else.

I am satisfied that had he gone before the people of the sixth district and told them that while he was ambitious to represent them in Congress, yet as an honorable man he could not afford to countenance or encourage any fraudulent or questionable methods to bring about that result, the election would have been fair and the count honest throughout the district. But it is an unfortunate fact that no such words as these were ever known to fall from his lips. On the contrary, the fraudulent acts that were committed by a portion of his friends and supporters, and which resulted in his being returned to a seat upon this floor, were received by him with either silent acquiescence or public approval. His chief aim, his sole object, seems to have been to occupy a seat upon this floor, regardless of the means by which that result might be brought about. I can assure the House and the country of the fact that it gives me no pleasure to feel compelled, in vindicating the cause of truth and justice, to use such strong language in referring to my distinguished opponent, because, aside from his questionable election methods, he is a gentleman whose ability, eloquence, and genial disposition are calculated to commend him to the appreciation and respect of those with whom he may be officially or socially connected. Gladly would I acquit him of ever having countenanced or encouraged the commission of election frauds if the facts would only warrant me in so doing.

But, Mr. Speaker, must it be assumed that the commission of these crimes and these outrages are encouraged by the wealth and the intelligence of the sixth district of Mississippi? In the name of those who in ante-bellum days gave tone and character to Southern society, under the supervision and direction of some of whom I received my early training, and by whom I was taught to seek through a laudable and commendable ambition the realization and accomplishment of those things which can be honorably achieved only by those who are imbued with and actuated by the highest, noblest, and most exalted aspirations, I must enter my earnest and emphatic protest against such an unjust, unfair, and unreasonable assumption. While I admit that the late war, which was disastrous in its results so far as many of the Southern white people were concerned, produced a marked and lamentable decadence in the public morals of that section, yet I know, of my own personal knowledge, that there are, even in the sixth district of Mississippi, white men and Democrats who are admitted by all who know them to be men of honor, character, and integrity. When, therefore, the contestee attempts to make it appear that these men indorse and defend the methods by which he was returned to a seat upon this floor, he thereby becomes a maligner of his section and a traducer of the most intelligent and respectable portion of his own people.

I can assert whereof I know to be a fact that there are thousands of Democrats in the sixth district of Mississippi, many of whom voted for the contestee, but who know and admit that he was fairly and honestly defeated, and that he reflects no credit upon himself, his party, and his State in claiming a seat upon such a flimsy and ridiculous plea as the one set up by him in this case. The worst that can be said about these law-abiding Democrats is, that through a mistaken zeal for the success of their party they remain, as a rule, reticent and inactive, while the ignorant and immoral are allowed to debauch the suffrage in the interest of the Democratic party, and thus bring odium and disgrace upon their State and party.

Both of the great political parties of the day are no doubt anxious to bring about a cessation of the agitation of sectionalism. They differ only as to the basis upon which this agitation shall cease. The Democrats who are in favor of upholding and defending the Bourbon system of fraudulent elections, as illustrated in this case, for instance, are anxious to bring about a cessation of sectional agitation upon the basis of a violent and fraudulent suppression of the popular will. The Republicans, on the other hand, and I am pleased to be able to say thousands of honest Democrats as well, are anxious that this agitation shall cease, upon such conditions as will secure to all citizens the equal protection of the laws, and a willing acquiescence in the lawfully expressed will of the majority. As an humble member of the great Republican party, I have no hesitation in declaring it to be the unchangeable determination of that party to continue to wage a persistent war upon Bourbon methods at the South until the right of every citizen to cast his ballot for the man or the party of his choice and have that ballot fairly and honestly counted shall have been acquiesced in from one end of the country to the other. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, so far as this case is concerned it is not a question of party. It is one that appeals to the patriotism and justice of the American people. You are called upon to determine in this case whether or not 10,000 voters of one party in a district shall be allowed through systematic frauds and ballot-box manipulation to be equal to 20,000 voters of the other party in a district where the election is fairly and honestly conducted. You are called upon to determine whether or not in a district containing about 40,000 voters 30,000 of them shall be allowed through the commission and perpetration of flagitious crimes to be practically disfranchised and the 10,000 alone to have voice and representation upon this floor. You are called upon to determine whether or not these grave offenses against law, justice, and public morals shall receive the condemnation or approbation of the national House of Representatives. To the Democratic members of the House who are the chosen representatives of a willing constituency and whose titles are not saturated with the crime of fraud, I have this to say: that you will accept the fraudulent methods and practices that were resorted to in behalf of the contestee in this case as your standard of political morality is what I have been too charitable to believe and too generous to assert. That any considerable number of representatives of any party can give these offenses the sanction of their approval is what I cannot and will not believe until that fact has been unmistakably demonstrated.

I am aware of the fact that Southern Republicans are sometimes reproached because they do not make forcible resistance to the perpetration of these frauds; but it must be remembered that the frauds are always committed under some sort of color of law. The five thousand and more Republican tickets that were thrown out in the sixth district of Mississippi were thrown out by men whose sworn duty it was to make true and correct returns of all the votes polled in their respective counties. In counties where not less than 5,000 votes were counted and returned for the contestee that were polled against him, the frauds were either committed by the sworn officers themselves or by accomplices who had been selected for that purpose. The frauds are always committed either by the sworn officers of the law or by others with their knowledge and approval. What lawful redress have Republicans, then, except to do just what I am now doing?

You certainly cannot expect them to resort to mob law and brute force, or to use what may be milder language, inaugurate a revolution. My opinion is that revolution is not the remedy to be applied in such cases. Our system of government is supposed to be one of law and order, resting upon the consent of the governed, as expressed through the peaceful medium of the ballot. In all localities where the local public sentiment is so dishonest, so corrupt, and so demoralized as to tolerate the commission of election frauds, and shield the perpetrators from justice, such people must be made to understand that there is patriotism enough in this country and sufficient love of justice and fair play in the hearts of the American people to prevent any party from gaining the ascendency in the Government that relies upon a fraudulent ballot and a false return as the chief source of its support.

BRAVERY AND FIDELITY OF THE COLORED PEOPLE.

The impartial historian will record the fact that the colored people of the South have contended for their rights with a bravery and a gallantry that is worthy of the highest commendation. Being, unfortunately, in dependent circumstances, with the preponderance of the wealth and intelligence against them in some localities, yet they have bravely refused to surrender their honest convictions, even upon the altar of their personal necessities. They have said to those upon whom they depended: You may deprive me for the time being of the opportunity of making an honest living; you may take the bread out of the mouths of my hungry and dependent family; you may close the school-house door in the face of my children; yea, more, you may take that which no man can give, my life, but my manhood, my principles you cannot have! [Applause.] Even when the flag of our country was trailing in the dust of treason and rebellion; when the Constitution was ignored, and the lawfully chosen and legally constituted authorities of the Government were disregarded and disobeyed; although the bondman's yoke of oppression was then upon their necks, yet they were then true and loyal to their Government, and faithful to the flag of their country. [Applause.]

They were faithful and true to you then; they are no less so to-day. And yet they ask no special favors as a class; they ask no special protection as a race. They feel that they purchased their inheritance when upon the battle-fields of their country they watered the tree of liberty with the precious blood that flowed from their loyal veins. [Loud applause.] They ask no favors; they demand what they deserve and must have, an equal chance in the race of life. They feel that they are a part and parcel of you, bone of your bone, flesh of your flesh. Your institutions are their institutions, and your Government is their Government. You cannot consent to the elimination of the colored man from the body-politic, especially through questionable and fraudulent methods, without consenting to your own downfall and to your own destruction. That the colored people of the United States have made and are making material progress in the acquisition of knowledge, the accumulation of wealth, and in the development of a high order of civilization are facts known, recognized, and admitted by all except those who are too blind to see them or too prejudiced to admit them.

The condition of the colored people of this country to-day is a living contradiction of the prophecies of those who have predicted that the two races could not live upon the same continent together upon terms of political equality. In spite of these predictions we are here to day, clothed with the same rights, the same privileges, and the same immunities, with complete political assimilation; loyal to the same Government, true to the same flag; yielding obedience to the same laws, revering the same institutions; actuated by the same patriotic impulses, imbued with the same noble ambition; entertaining the same hopes, seeking the gratification and satisfaction of the same aspirations; identified with the same interests, speaking the same language; professing the same religion, worshiping the same God. The colored man asks you in this particular instance to give effect to his ballot, not for his sake alone, but for yours as well. He asks you to recognize the fact that he has the right to assist you in defending, protecting, and upholding our Government and perpetuating our institutions. You must, then, as I am sure you will, condemn the crimes against our institutions, against law, against justice, and against public morals that were committed in this case.

CONCLUSION.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I regret to be compelled to say that it seems to be the settled determination of the Bourbon party at the South that we must either have a centralized Government or no Government at all. They seem to be determined that if they cannot destroy the Government in one way they will in another; for it is an incontrovertible and indisputable fact that the sanctity and the purity of the ballot is the chief pillar in our governmental structure. Destroy that pillar, and the structure must necessarily fall. I speak to-day not in behalf of my party, but in behalf of my country. I hope that I speak not as a partisan, but as a patriot. If the party to which I belong and to which I feel that I owe allegiance cannot commend itself to the approbation and support of a majority of the American people upon its merits, then it does not deserve success. Political parties under our system of Government are supposed to be organized for the purpose of advocating certain political principles and to carry into effect certain public policies. Upon all such questions we may honestly differ and make such differences the basis of party organization. But upon questions affecting the stability of the Government and the perpetuity of our institutions we are at least presumed to be a united, harmonious, and indissoluble people.

Mr. Speaker, this disgraceful system of election frauds in several of the Southern States through and by which that section was made solid in its support of one of the great political parties of the day ought, must, and will be destroyed. [Applause.] The people of this great country are too intelligent and patriotic to tolerate a continuance of such outrages upon our elective system. Such methods and such practices are contrary to the spirit of the age in which we live and to the civilization of the nineteenth century. That there may exist in all parts of our country—North, South, East, and West—and among all races and classes of our people peace, happiness, concord, and fraternal feeling upon such conditions as will secure to all exact justice and the equal protection of the laws is the aim, the object, the hope, and the aspiration of every patriotic American citizen. For the accomplishment of these grand and noble purposes and the attainment of these commendable and patriotic ends, I invoke, in the language of the immortal Lincoln, the considerate judgment of mankind and the gracious favor of almighty God. [Great applause.]

ELECTION CONTEST—LYNCH VS. CHALMERS.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Speaker, the contestant began his remarks by the announcement he would not discuss either the law or the facts of this case, and I take it that no gentleman who heard him will differ with him in regard to that proposition. He has not discussed either the law or the testimony as disclosed in the record before this House. What he has said is but a repetition of what has been said time and time again by him and his co-conspirators who have, through the public press of this country, endeavored to destroy the reputation of the white people of the Southern States. Gentlemen who have heard that address will perhaps recall the language of the notice of contest in this case, which was filled full of just such generalities, full of such charges of fraud, violence, and all manner of corruption. And yet when the question came to be tried, when the proof was asked for, when it was adduced before a committee of this House, they have by their report refused to agree with him, except on one single point he made.

He has undertaken to arraign me personally before this House. I ask gentlemen to look at the record which he has brought here himself and see whether there is anything in it, a line or a syllable from the beginning to the end, that casts any personal aspersion on my character. He said distinctly in his speech just made, that in the county of Warren, which is my home, where I lived, the election was as fair and free and the vote as full as it could possibly have been; and his only charge offered was that my law partner presented a legal exception to the counting of the marked ballots cast in this county, and his exception was afterward maintained by the supreme court of the State of Mississippi. That and that alone is the charge he now offers, and none whatever is shown against me in the record he presents before this House.

I am sorry the record does not show the same thing as to himself. If you will look into the record you will find him convicted of having twice contradicted himself by making directly contradictory statements, and making them under oath. This will show you at once how much confidence can be placed in the statements he makes.

When the question first came up about these marked ballots of which so much has been said, he endeavored to persuade the secretary of state to count them for him. In order to convince the secretary that these ballots should be counted for him, he said his ballots were exactly alike in the whole district, and they had been counted in every county except Warren. The contestant was asked the question by the secretary of state whether these ballots were all printed at the same office. His reply was, "No, they were printed at two different offices." When I heard that, I came to the conclusion that it was impossible that such peculiar marks as appeared upon these tickets could have been put upon them, and put upon them in the identical place on each and of the same character, by two different printing offices, unless it was done by design. The secretary asked him the next day, in the presence of a witness, in order to fasten this testimony upon him, the same question. Lynch then said: "You misunderstood me. They were not printed at two different offices. I had them all printed at one office."

That is the testimony as it appears in the record in this case. I do not go outside of it. Notwithstanding his contradiction of his first statement and his statement that they were printed at one office, the record shows conclusively that they were printed at two different offices; therefore the contestant stands convicted of not having spoken the truth, and he is convicted by the record and not by any outside statement of mine. Again, when he offered himself as a witness in this case and was cross-examined, the question was asked if he had examined the proofs of the tickets; he said: "I examined the proofs of those printed at the Miller office, but have no recollection of having examined those that were printed at the Herald office at all. I supposed one examination was sufficient." And yet on the record you will find in another place on the next day he states in detail when he went into the Herald office what he said to the foreman there, and that he then and there compared his tickets with the Democratic tickets which were shown him in that office. Here again he is convicted of making directly contradictory statements. Now, I say you may search that record from beginning to end, and every member of the Committee on Elections will bear me witness to the fact that there is no line or syllable contained in it that will cast one single spot or blemish upon my personal character.

But upon this question of these marked ballots let me say further that my attention was called here to-day to a fact to which I desire to ask the careful attention of this House. It is pretended, as I have shown, that these tickets were marked in this peculiar manner accidentally, although it was done at two different offices. Now, my attention has just been called to the fact that a majority of the committee undertook to have printed in their report a fac simile of one of these tickets, and yet the ticket exhibited in that report is not a fac simile of the one used, and I ask the chairman to look and see if in this respect I do not speak the truth. That attempted fac simile of this ticket is set out in the majority report of the committee and any gentleman can compare it with the ticket exhibited in the testimony and see for himself that one is not a fac simile of the other. Again, in the RECORD of to-day, printed for the use of this House, the majority report is again printed, and again the Public Printer of this Congress attempted, with the report before him, to make a fac simile of the ticket appearing in the report, and again he failed to do so; and I ask the chairman of the committee if I am not correct. So we have here two efforts of the Public Printer under instructions to make a fac simile of this ticket and yet neither is correct, and the two thus made still further differ from each other.

Mr. CALKINS. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him in this connection?

Mr. CHALMERS. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. CALKINS. I wish to state that I think it was possibly my fault, and not that of the Public Printer, that this fac simile was not made. My impression is that in sending over to the Printer the ticket, which it was desired to have copied exactly, I sent one of the tickets which appeared in your brief.

Mr. CHALMERS. Then that only strengthens the point, because the chairman of the committee admits that he himself and the Public Printer both could not make a fac simile of that ticket.

Mr. CALKINS. I only want to say this in justice to the Public Printer, for it was perhaps not his mistake but my own.

Mr. CHALMERS. With all of the facilities afforded by that extensive printing office a fac simile of the ticket was not made when attention was especially called to it. Again, as I have said, in the RECORD of this morning, where the majority report of the committee is set out in full, the Public Printer undertakes to give a fac simile of the ticket, and I desire to call attention to the fact that again he makes a failure. They have put marks on these tickets in both cases to which I have referred which differ entirely from those on the original ticket, and differing from each other, although endeavoring to make a copy; and yet you are asked to believe that in the city of Vicksburgh two printing offices printed identically the same tickets with four different and peculiar marks upon them, and this was done without any design. And yet we are told there is no fraud and no intention to commit any in printing these tickets. I believe that there is no gentleman who will not admit that these ballots should not be counted if on a candid examination of the facts they believe these marks upon the tickets were put there with intent, and not by accident.

Mr. Speaker, nothing is more difficult to combat than rumor. Virgil said of it, "crescat eundo." It runs with the wind, and gathers strength at every step. This was true of it in the earliest days of the world, and is a thousandfold more true now when it flies on the wings of the telegraph, and is disseminated by the unlimited power of the press. The public mind is quick to believe scandal, and there is a morbid appetite which devours with avidity every tale of outrage and horror. However false the story may be, and however clear and convincing the refutation which comes after, few stop to learn the truth, while the falsehood rolls on like the increasing waters of the Mississippi, until it covers with ruin all who fall victims to its fury. A false and slanderous tale of horror was once told of a confederate fight which shocked the humanity of the civilized world. If it had been true, what was said of it on this floor was eminently true, savages might have sat at the feet of its perpetrators and learned lessons in brutal atrocity; but there are gallant Union soldiers on this floor whom I met often in battle, General BROWNE, of Indiana, and Colonel HEPBURN, of Iowa, who I met not only in fight but under a flag of truce, when we broke bread and tasted salt together, and I think I may safely trust either of these gentlemen to defend me any where against such foul accusations.

A man believed to be guilty or reasonably suspected of being guilty of such barbarity would naturally and readily be believed guilty of any crime that malice, envy, or party prejudice could bring against him. When it was charged that the same man was the head and front of bulldozing in Mississippi, intimidating and driving colored voters from the polls, or the head of ballot-box stuffers, committing the most outrageous frauds upon suffrage and polluting the fountain-head of our free institutions, and when these charges were flashed over the country as Associated Press dispatches, it is not strange that the public believed them. Nor was it strange that a political Guiteau, inspired by these inflammatory newspaper denunciations, should have sought notoriety by attempting in the name of humanity and civilization to assassinate the political rights of such a man. The imbecility or insanity of such a harmless creature is only to be pitied. If he can forgive himself, I can certainly forgive him for his tragic failure.

The passion and prejudice excited by these false charges is the first great obstacle to an honest, fair, and impartial consideration of this case. That Republicans should entertain these preconceived prejudices is not to be wondered at, when there are Democrats on this floor who I asked to look into the record and who answered me that they were afraid to look for fear they might find something they would not like to know.

I have challenged investigation. I have urged gentlemen on both sides of this Chamber to search the record to the bottom, and if they found anything in the record disgraceful to me or my district to decide against me. And I say now, if after a careful examination of the record, the arguments, and the reports any gentleman on this floor, whether Democrat or Republican believes that the contestant has by legal evidence established his claim to a seat in Congress, I hope they will vote for him without regard to politics.

I hope on the other hand that no gentleman here will violate law and disregard long and well-established rules of evidence in order to reach a conclusion or sustain a preconceived opinion founded on rumor.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another and almost insurmountable obstacle to an impartial consideration by Republicans of this case. Party ties are strong and no man likes to place himself in opposition to his party friends and party associates. It subjects him to the sneers of being a self-religious pretender to more honesty than his neighbors and to the harsh criticism of being a traitor to his political allegiance. It makes him an object of distrust and suspicion among those whose good opinion he prizes and whose confidence he would sacrifice much to preserve.

I know the barriers that stand in the pathway of any Republican who might feel inclined to vote against the majority of his party in this case. It would be as self-sacrificing in a pagan to confess himself a Christian, a Protestant to proclaim himself a Catholic, or a Jew to acknowledge that any good could come out of Nazareth, as for a Republican, in the face of the newspaper clamor on the subject, suddenly to acknowledge that the election of a Democrat in the sixth Congressional district in Mississippi was legal and fair. And yet I have faith enough in humanity to believe that there are some gentlemen on that side of the Chamber who can break through the crust of political prejudice and who, if they can see the truth as it is, will do justice even in a case like this. If they can be made to see and to understand that in order to seat the contestant they must disregard law, and must violate long and well-established rules of evidence, I will not believe until I hear and see it that able and intelligent lawyers will sacrifice their honest convictions on well-settled principles of law at the dictation of newspaper clamor.

I have therefore besought gentlemen on both sides of the House to examine the record thoroughly, and I am proud to say that all who have examined it and have spoken to me on the subject have confessed to me their great surprise at finding how grossly the case had been misrepresented by the press. And some of my Republican friends have gone further and confessed that they were disappointed in not finding clear and convincing proof of fraud, violence, and corruption. But unfortunately few have found time to examine the record or the reports. Some even of the Committee on Elections have acknowledged to me that they did not have time to examine the case, and they relied upon the report of the sub-committee. So it is, the House relies upon the committee, the committee relies upon the sub-committee, and the sub-committee sometimes relies upon one man, so that a member's right to his seat is left to the hazard of a single judgment. The newspapers have harried the committee with a cry for the rejection of Southern Democrats. All the sub-committees have been diligently at work at the same time on different cases, and they come with reports all signed by the whole committee, and yet announcing diametrically opposite opinions of law and conclusions on facts in different cases. The incongruities of these reports would be laughable if the subject was not too serious for laughter.

Three sub-committees were examining three different cases all at the same time. And I say to you that in the Bisbee-Finley case and in the Lynch-Chalmers case three identical questions arose. One sub-committee decides them one way to unseat a Democratic member from Florida, and another sub-committee decides them diametrically the other way to unseat the Democratic member from Mississippi. They are led to this inconsistency because of the fact that they were all examining the cases at the same time.

Now, look at the Florida case—and, by the way, it made a difference of only 27 votes against General Finley. There the question was as to whether certain Republicans had voted for Presidential electors, leaving off the name of the candidate for Congress. It was said a Republican enemy of Mr. Bisbee induced them without their knowledge to so vote. The proof of the voters was brought in; they were ignorant negroes, and could not know what was or was not on the tickets they voted, but they swore that they had voted for Mr. Bisbee. The clerk of the court was called upon to produce the ballots as they were preserved in the ballot-box in his office. Those ballots thus produced showed that the voters had not voted for Mr. Bisbee; that they had simply voted for the Presidential electors.

Now, what does the committee do in that case? They say it is enough to say in reply that there is no law in Florida that requires ballots to be preserved; no law in Florida that authorizes a clerk to have anything to do with the election returns; and therefore they hold that that testimony is of no value. And I think they are right on this point.

Now, when you come to the Mississippi case you see this same question arises: that 742 votes are counted for contestant from Issaquena County, of which there is no earthly testimony except the testimony of the certificate of the chancery clerk, who undertakes to give a certificate as to what he says is the record of the votes on file in his office. Now, I answer the committee, just as Mr. RANNEY says in his report in the Florida case, that it is enough to say there is no law in Mississippi to authorize the ballots to be preserved, and there is no law in Mississippi to authorize the chancery clerk to have anything to do with election returns.

But the gentleman who made the majority report in the Mississippi case says that he attaches that clerk's certificate onto something else. He says that the commissioners reported to the secretary of state that they had rejected so many votes from Hayes's Landing, for instance, 75 votes. And the report says that while that does not of itself show for whom they were cast, in comes the clerk's certificate to supplement that of the commissioners, and the clerk's certificate corroborates and sustains the number of votes thrown out.

Now, if you will examine that certificate you will find that this is not true, and that the clerk's certificate does not correspond with the commissioners'. In the first place, it is said by the commissioners that 75 votes were thrown out by them. If you will look at the pretended certificate of the clerk you will find that it reports only 65 votes cast for Mr. Lynch and Mr. Chalmers. So that the concurrence of statement which the committee rely on does not hold good if you look to the vote for Congressmen. Nor does it hold good when you look to the votes cast for Presidential candidates.

But that ought not to cut any figure in this case, because every lawyer knows that when any certifying officer gives a certificate about that which the law does not authorize him to certify to it is of no value. When he gives a certificate about a record which the law does not authorize him to make every lawyer knows that the certificate so given is of no value whatever. Yet upon that flimsy testimony they count 742 votes for Mr. Lynch. Now, if you strike out those votes he is defeated by 315 majority, for they claim for him only 385 majority.

Again, take Mr. RANNEY's report in the Bisbee-Finley case, in the Orange County precinct, in Florida. Here again he lays down the law correctly, that no returns can be counted unless they are signed and certified by the inspectors; and when once rejected they must be proved by evidence aliunde or they cannot be counted. That is what they say in the Florida case, and that is the law. That is sustained by McCrary and every other writer on elections.

But when they come to apply that rule to the Mississippi case you will find that they count 481 votes in favor of the contestant in Bolivar County under worse circumstances than in Florida, for in Bolivar County the commissioners refused to count the vote, in Mississippi, while in Florida the commissioners did count them. Yet in the Florida case they say that those votes must be stricken out because the commissioners counted them, while in the Mississippi case they say they must be put in because the commissioners did not count them; the two standing upon precisely the same testimony. And here again I say that if you strike out those 481 votes the contestant is defeated, even if you give him the 742 votes counted for him by the committee upon the clerk's certificate on Issaquena.

Again, in the Florida case it was determined that when the ballots in the box outnumber the voters the whole poll must be thrown out. That was the old common-law rule. Many of the States, Florida among the number, have corrected it by statute; and yet the committee refused to abide by the Florida statute and purge the vote, while in Mississippi, where the commissioners followed the precise rule which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY] and the majority of the committee lay down in the Florida case, they are denounced for having committed a fraud upon the election. In the Palestine box in Adams County there were found 35 more votes than there were voters; there were only 17 Democratic voters altogether. These extra votes could not have been put in by any Democratic ballot-box stuffer. The box was left during the recess in the hands of colored men. When the question was asked whether they were not all Republicans who had charge of the box, old Leonnox Scott answered: "I cannot say they were all Republicans; they were all colored men; but heaps of colored men calls themselves Republicans and they votes the Democratic ticket." There having been found in this box 35 more votes than there were voters, it follows, according to the rule laid down by the gentleman from Massachusetts—the old rule must stand where not corrected by statute—the box should go out. Yet the majority of the committee come in and say in their report it must be counted and thus give 214 majority for the contestant from this box.

Mr. CALKINS. I can now answer the question of my friend from Mississippi which I was not able to answer directly awhile ago. I am now able to state that the mistake in the report of the committee is entirely a mistake of the Printing Office, as any one can see by an examination of the ticket appearing in the original brief of the contestee, [Mr. CHALMERS,] a copy of which was sent to the Printing Office.

Mr. CHALMERS. So then I was right——

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman was right.

Mr. CHALMERS. That the Printing Office, although instructed to make a fac-simile, did not do it, while you would have us believe the Vicksburgh offices did it accidentally and without instructions.

I repeat that three propositions of law are decided one way in the Florida case and the other way in this Mississippi case by this Committee on Elections; and the determination of the Mississippi case will be in favor of the sitting member if either one of the two first propositions laid down in the Florida case is maintained, and both are unquestionably the law. The clerk's certificate was no more than a private paper from Issaquena. And in Bolivar the boxes were properly rejected because not signed and certified. Having once been rejected they must be otherwise proved, and yet no proof is offered except the statement of the commissioners as to the number they rejected. This was no better proof than in the Florida case when the commissioners not only stated the number of votes but who they were for, and counted them. In the Bolivar County case they do not state who the votes were pretended to be for. In truth, in one of the boxes the commissioners expressly say they do not know for what officer the votes were cast, and in the other they simply say so many Democratic and so many Republican votes. This certainly was no proof of the vote aliunde.

Again, in the case of Stolboard vs. Aiken, the Committee on Elections have laid down the doctrine that in the settlement of these cases they will follow the rules of evidence; and, as suggested by my friend from Georgia, [Mr. HAMMOND,] the House adopted that report; so that the House stands committed to the doctrine that the rules of evidence should be followed in determining election cases. If you follow those rules in this case, it is impossible for any man to say that the contestant is entitled to a seat. The votes counted on the chancery clerk's certificate must unquestionably go out; and that settles the case. The 481 votes in Bolivar County must go out; and that adds to the majority against the contestant.

Now, I ask gentlemen why are they not willing to listen to reason and to law in this case? Why do they come here with their minds made up in advance that they must, as was stated by the contestant, look to the number of colored voters in the district and the number of white voters, and from that determine how many Republican votes and how many Democratic votes were cast? This whole question was distinctly brought up years ago in the Forty-fifth Congress by Mr. Blaine in the Senate, when he introduced a resolution for the purpose of inquiring into the suppression of colored voters in the South. He then took the sixth district of Mississippi as his text, and said he was asked to believe that all the colored voters in that district had been converted from Republicanism to Democracy in the twinkling of an eye. I say now what I said in Mississippi, that if this district had there and then been properly defended in the Senate the heavy load that rests upon my shoulders would not be there to-day. I attempted to get the floor in the House to defend my district but failed. I published a defense in the RECORD; it appears in the proceedings of the last session of the Forty-fifth Congress; yet I venture to say that not half a dozen men in this House ever read it.

I said then, as I say now, that this great Republican majority in the counties forming that district was the fact that brought about the overthrow of the Republican party there. I repeat now the statements I then made. I first call attention to the fact that in Tunica County, the upper county of my district, Captain Manning, a Federal soldier and Freedmen's Bureau officer, the sheriff of the county and my personal friend, had been a prominent candidate for United States Senator, and was defeated by Mr. Bruce, a colored man, who ably represented Mississippi in the Senate. Captain Manning came back under the belief that the colored men had treated him unfairly in that race; and in the next canvass, when Mr. Lynch another colored leader was nominated for Congress, Captain Manning openly opposed him on the stump with all the force of his office, and the result was that while Hayes carried that county by 1,800 majority over Tilden, I had a majority of 600 over Lynch; a majority counted under the supervision of Republican officers. There was the first break in that county.

Take next the county of Coahoma, the home of Governor Alcorn. There a split grew up between the Alcorn and the Ames wings of the Republican party, which grew so violent that it resulted in a riot. Three hundred armed negroes came into the town of Friar's Point for the purpose of assailing Governor Alcorn and burning the town. They were dispersed by a combined force of Democratic and Republican white men. This produced a split in that county, which utterly destroyed the Republican organization there.

Take next Bolivar County. In that county there was a wide split growing out of a contest between two colored men for the office of sheriff. A gentleman on this floor, lately a colored Senator from Mississippi, who lived in that county, knows what I say to be true. These two colored men, Johnson and Ousley, were candidates for sheriff. There were two candidates for clerk, a white carpet-bagger by the name of Florey and a colored man named Stirling. The contest was so great that it brought out the largest vote ever polled in that county. There was a difference of only 15 in the votes of the candidates for sheriff, and of only 1 in the votes of the candidates for clerk. The colored man charged that he was cheated by his carpet-bag opponent, and this produced the utter demoralization and destruction of the party organization in that county.

Take next Warren County. There, in 1872, Grant had a majority of 3,000 over Greeley; yet in the next year, when there was a split between Ames and Alcorn, Ames carried the county by merely 225 majority. Thus there was a split in the politics of that county.

Come next to Adams County, the home of the contestant. There a split grew up between McCary, a colored candidate for sheriff, and Wood, another colored candidate. Mr. Lynch and his friends supported McCary; the Democrats took up Wood and he was elected. Here again the Republican organization in the county went to pieces.

And immediately after this, the next year, for the first time these counties were put together into a Congressional district. They had no county organization, they had no district organization, and when they met to nominate a candidate for Congress the colored men took possession of the convention and nominated Mr. Lynch. Many of the white Republicans left it in disgust and supported me in the canvass, saying, if the colored Republicans think they can run this district by themselves let them try it.

All these facts are to be found in the record published in the last session of the Forty-fifth Congress. I refer to them now simply to show how all this talk about a large colored majority in my district when sifted to the bottom shows that this of itself was the cause of their downfall. The Democrats took advantage of the splits in the counties and won the victory.

Now, then, in that condition of affairs I was nominated as the Democratic candidate for Congress. It was stated at the time, and it was generally acquiesced in, that I had some popularity in the counties where I had practiced law; and I believe I can refer to the testimony of some gentlemen, and Republican gentlemen, too, who went down the Mississippi River in the Forty-sixth Congress to inspect the levees—I think they will bear witness that they were met by colored men who told them, although they were Republicans, they had voted for me for Congress and would do it again. They so reported to me on their return, and I believe their testimony to be true.

If I may be pardoned the egotism of it, I can point you to two instances which show that the belief of my Democratic friends was well founded. In that same county of Bolivar there were two colored preachers, Nelson Glass, a Baptist, and Simon Daniel, a Methodist. They were both justices of the peace. It was in the early days of colored office-holding. They were under the impression the fines and forfeitures they collected for misdemeanors belonged to themselves, and they pocketed the money. They were indicted for embezzlement. They were prosecuted with great fierceness by the district attorney and by the judge on the bench. I defended them, and it was a scene of intense excitement. The court-room was filled with women and men. The first verdict was brought in about ten o'clock at night. When the jury came in there was a breathless silence in the room. When the clerk read out the verdict, not guilty, there broke out as wild a camp-meeting scene as ever occurred in the woods of Tennessee or Georgia. The old women began to clap their hands and shout "hallelujah!" and "glory to God!" The men began to cheer, and they took me on their shoulders and bore me in triumph from that court-room.

Again, when I was elected to Congress five years ago I started in my buggy to the steamboat landing, and the colored voters of Friar's Point, in the county of Coahoma, took the horse from the buggy and dragged it to the landing themselves. This I say is some evidence I had some popularity with these colored people. Instead of making my canvass with a rifle and shot-gun, as was falsely charged here by the contestant to-day, it is a matter of history I made it with a brass band of instruments blown on by colored musicians, and in a patriotic band-wagon which was painted red, white, and blue. [Laughter and applause.]

In the second canvass I made, as was admitted by the contestant here to-day, I had no opposition. In the last canvass, which is now being considered, I had the additional advantage that I had faithfully served my people in this Congress. I believe every man who served with me in the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses will bear witness that I have been as diligent and earnest in looking after the interest of my colored constituents as I have after the interest of my Democratic white constituents. This gave me an additional advantage in that race.

But I had still another advantage. Mr. Lynch was opposed to General Grant in the Chicago convention. The negroes of my district were devoted to General Grant, and some of the best colored speakers in that district, equally as good as the contestant himself, were his opponents on the stump and advocated my election because they charged him with having been a traitor to the great hero who, next to Abraham Lincoln, had won their emancipation and their freedom in this country.

Now, gentlemen, to say under these circumstances that you must claim a solid Republican vote from the colored people is to say that they are not to be moved either by sympathy or reason. It is to say that you deny to them the common instincts of humanity. If you say this it would be to admit that the Republican party had attempted to place the destiny, the liberty, the rights of property, and every other right of the white men of the South under the authority of stocks and stones which could not be moved by anything. Now, you can take your choice: you can believe these voters are moved like other voters, by sympathy and reason, or you must come out and admit you have endeavored to destroy the civilization of the white people of the Southern States.

I have said there is no charge against me personally in this record; but I feel as deep an interest in the honesty and integrity of my constituents as I do in my own. This Committee on Elections undertakes to point out one single case of fraud in the whole district.

I ask gentlemen and appeal to them to examine the record for themselves before they vote on this case, and they will find that so far from contradicting the solemn, sworn returns, as the contestant has said—and mark you it was a solemn, sworn return—instead of contradicting that return the testimony absolutely sustains the count as made by the commissioners of election. Who are the witnesses? The first is the brother of Mr. Lynch himself. He was there on the ground from the morning until the noon adjournment. He says he went there to look and see that there was a fair count, and that he went and looked at the tickets before they were put into the box. He says there were 235 votes polled before he left, and of that number he saw a majority of them. All he saw had the name of his brother on them. If he saw no more it is an evidence that the voters were against him and did not desire him to see their ballots. This is the Kingston precinct. He only claims that he saw a majority of the whole number, and 219 is therefore all that he pretends to swear to having seen. Jerry Taylor swears to only 60. Abraham Felters, the constable who stood at the door to allow the voters to come in, said they generally showed their tickets to him as they came in. They all rely upon the testimony of the Republican challenger. He stood at the polls with pencil and paper, and swears that every voter was instructed to show his ticket before he put it into the box, so that he could make a private tally. Now he puts down 350 votes as having been cast for Mr. Lynch, and yet on examination he says that he could only swear to 160 for Lynch. He is a colored man and a partisan friend of the contestant. Three times he swears positively that he saw only 160 votes for Lynch.

Now, when you look into the returns from this box you find that the inspectors and commissioners have given him exactly this number, 160 votes. If there had been any tampering with the ballots after they were cast, as has been alleged, it certainly is a most remarkable thing that these men who were robbing the ballot-box should have left in it precisely the same number, no more and no less than the partisan friends of Lynch swear he was entitled to and as having been seen cast for him. Now, this testimony sustains the count of the returning officers instead of impeaching it. But suppose there had been a difference between the two counts. If, as they pretend to believe, there was tampering, or if the one count did not sustain the other, which would be entitled to most credit? Now, it clearly appears on the cross-examination, the witness Fowles says that of the 350 votes cast 160 were cast for Lynch, and some of them might have voted the Democratic ticket; but I say, if these witnesses had sworn positively that the 350 votes were all cast for Lynch what would have been the attitude of the case? Are not the sworn officers of election entitled to consideration? Were not the sworn officers, men of intelligence and character, who returned under their oaths 160 votes for Lynch, entitled to consideration?

But you say they are white partisan friends of mine. How was it on the other side—were they not partisan friends of the contestant? I bring out the testimony of the sworn officers of the law. On the other hand is produced the colored partisans of the contestant. They sustain the count which you here complain of. But if they did not, which testimony will you take? Will you take the tally-stick at the poll, kept on the outside, or the sworn return, signed, sealed, certified to by the duly authorized officers who conducted the election?

In order to set aside these returns you must fasten corruption upon the people of Kingston precinct, and who are they? I have the book here, but will not stop to read it. In the history of Mississippi stands the record of the town of Kingston, reaching back one hundred and twenty years. The settlers of Kingston were the descendants of a New Jersey preacher. It is said that they increased in numbers, grew rich and prospered; that they were distinguished for high moral character, and that they were distinguished for refinement and hospitality; and the history of Mississippi will bear it out. The Farrars, the Fowles, the Ashfords, the Swazeys live there to-day, and their names appear in this record. Their history reaches back to New Jersey, one hundred and twenty years ago. Now, what are you asked to believe? That these descendants of distinguished families whose names they still bear, that these men were willing, in order to put me into Congress, to do dishonor to their name and their ancestry, that they were willing to resort to fraud and swindling in the election; and you must believe that upon the evidence of a mere tally-stick, kept by a partisan friend of the contestant who sits on the outside of the polls.

This Congress said the other day that the Chinaman was not a fit associate for the white man of California, that he was not even fit to labor for him there; but this Congress is asked by this contestant and this Committee on Elections to say that the descendant of the African is more honest, more honorable, and more truthful than the white descendants of the New Jersey preacher in Adams County, Mississippi. I appeal to the Jerseymen upon this floor to resent this insult cast upon their people who have made their homes in Mississippi. But, Mr. Speaker, in this case, if I understand the testimony correctly, it makes no difference whether you count the marked ballots rejected in Warren County or not. My certified majority was 3,779, and if you give the 2,000 marked ballots thrown out to the contestant, he is still a good ways from being elected.

But if you refuse to count the marked ballots then you do violence not only to New Jersey's descendants but to a sovereign State of this Union.

Time and time again this Congress has said by its solemn resolution and through its Committee on Elections that it will follow, and that every Federal authority will follow the decisions of the State authorities in regard to State laws and State constitutions. You said that in the Tennessee cases, when under it this House seated Republican members of Congress. You said that in the Iowa cases in the last Congress when you seated Republicans. You followed the decision of Indiana in the case of Neff against Shanks in the Forty-second Congress. You followed the decision of Pennsylvania in a distinguished case that occurred in the last Congress. And again you followed a decision of the supreme court of Florida in the Bisbee-Hull case.

Gentlemen now say that this is a single case. They demand a long line of decisions. When the Speaker of this House was making that report, when the chairman of this Elections Committee was making that report in the Bisbee-Hull case, they never once thought to stop and ask whether it was a single decision or a line of decisions. It was a single decision; and made about that identical case. And strange to say, the Committee on Elections come in here and say they will not follow the decision of the Mississippi court because it is a single decision and because it is in regard to a case now before Congress. And yet when we look into the report in the Mackey-O'Connor case we find that very same Elections Committee, in a report signed by every one of them, has said they would follow the decision of the supreme court of South Carolina because it gave the seat to Mr. Mackey, or because it said that seven precincts in Orangeburgh and Charleston should be counted for Mr. Mackey.

Here, then, we find that for the first time in the history of our Government you are advancing the doctrine that you will not follow a State decision. One of the committee said to me, "We only follow the decision when we approve it;" and they take good care never to approve it, except when it seats a Republican and throws out a Democrat. That is the position they stand in before the House and the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the fair-minded lawyers upon that side of the House, men who have said that they would stand by the law in every case, I ask them to look at the law in this case; I ask them as honest Representatives from their own States if they are willing to fix the stigma of shame upon the State of Mississippi? You have followed the decision of every other State; when it comes to mine, then for the first time you find exceptions to the rule.

Many years ago a gifted Representative of Mississippi stood in the Halls of Congress to protest against an outrage which he thought was about to be perpetrated on his State, and his eloquent words are more fit and proper now than they were then; and I repeat them here, that if you do this foul thing, if you refuse for the first time to extend either the right or the courtesy—I do not care which you choose to call it—if you refuse to extend to Mississippi what you have extended to every other State, then, in the language of Prentiss, I say:

> Strike from the flag of the Union the bright star that glitters to the name of Mississippi; but leave, oh, leave the stripe behind, fit emblem of her degradation.

Why, sir, but the other day we heard upon that side the declaration that with or without law, with or without Constitution, the polygamous Mormon must go. That speech was greeted with cheers, and its sentiments were adopted by the majority of this House. Yet when some Southern community rises indignantly and asserts the same doctrine in its self-defense, and in its determination to preserve its civilization, it is denounced from one end of this Union to the other. There was a time when the free-born white men of Mississippi said precisely what was said here; they were inspired by the same higher-law feeling that with or without law, with or without Constitution, the vice, the ignorance, and the superstition of the black man shall not destroy the civilization of the white man. But happily that day has passed away. The contestant himself testifies that it has passed away. We have been endeavoring to educate the colored man morally, socially, and politically.

You believe that that day has passed away, but you believe and you charge that in its place has come a day of fraud. Now, in the name of the sixth district of Mississippi, I deny this charge so far as that district is concerned, and I say that the record in this case proves it is false. I say that these very charges which this contestant has made here to-day were every one of them made before the courts of Mississippi, made before the United States courts, and every man who was brought to trial was acquitted after a fair, honest, and impartial trial before a mixed jury of whites and blacks, except those men from Coahoma County, who confessed exactly what they had done, and the judge said a fine of $1 was sufficient, because it was simply a mistake in their judgment of law. They have been all examined, too, by this Committee on Elections, and the Committee on Elections have failed to sustain the charge made by the contestant.

The contestant has said that the white men of Mississippi have counted out a Republican illegally and fraudulently. He attempted to prove it and he failed. And now the Republicans of this House are asked to stand up in the broad sunlight of Heaven, in the face of this whole nation, and illegally and forcibly to count a Democrat out from this House. Those who ask you to do it, no doubt, expect to sustain themselves by going before the country and appealing to the passions of men and describing in pathetic terms the wrongs of the downtrodden black man; but in my judgment the day has gone by when the people of the United States can be made to weep as we wept in childhood over the Last of the Mohicans and Uncle Tom's Cabin.

The faithless and the drunken savage in the West has knocked all the romance out of the peerless red man, which existed only in the imagination of Fennimore Cooper, and that touching story of gentle Eva has been forever dispelled by the matchless frauds and falsehoods of Eliza Pinkston.

And right here let me say to my friends from Iowa upon this subject of not following the State decisions, you know that the law of Congress requires that members of this House shall be elected in November, unless it is necessary to change the constitution of the State in order to change the time of your State elections.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan.) The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask that the time of the gentleman be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. CHALMERS. I thank the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS.] I shall not trespass much longer on the patience of this House.

I say that those gentlemen from Iowa came here, having been elected in October. Their seats were challenged. They proved to the Committee on Elections of the House that the State authorities had decided that the time of election could not be changed without changing the State constitution.

Mr. TUCKER. The governor had so decided.

Mr. CHALMERS. The governor alone had decided that. The Committee on Elections sustained that decision, or said that they would abide by the decision of the State authority, although it was not the decision of a court; that they would abide by the decision of the governor of your State, and so you gentlemen from Iowa were permitted to keep your seats in this House.

And now what do we see? The last Legislature of Iowa changed the time of holding the elections, and yet the constitution of the State still remains unchanged. Now, one of two things is true: either those nine members from Iowa sat here in the Forty-sixth Congress without legal authority, and by the grace of a Democratic House, because that Democratic House yielded respect to the decision of a State authority, or they held their seats rightfully. If they held them wrongfully, they owed them to the grace of a Democratic House. If they held them rightfully, then when the Iowa members of the next Congress come here, they will have been elected without a change of the constitution of the State. And possibly they may be invited to drink from that bitter cup which they now press to the lips of Mississippi. Gentlemen tell us now that Congress is a law to itself; that Congress must for itself construe State statutes and State constitutions. The next House of Representatives may be Democratic, and when those Iowa members come here they will come to ask that Democratic House to change the rule which is now made by their own Republican friends in this House. It may be possible that they may not be permitted to hold their seats, because they will have been elected under a constitution which has not been changed; and it has been held by the authority of that State that an election cannot be held there except in October without a change of the State constitution.

But let me say here that whatever may be the result in my case, I trust no such thing will ever be done by a Democratic Congress. If a State is to be dishonored, if its supreme court is to be treated with contempt by this Congress, I trust it may stand a monumental example as a warning to future generations—like the portrait of the traitor doge in Venice, which was turned to the wall—to mark an unparalleled crime in the annals of our legislation.

Much has been said in this discussion about when the Supreme Court of the United States would follow the decision of a State court. One decision was cited where a State court had made conflicting decisions; where they had changed the rules of property, had destroyed the rights of property. When that case came before the Supreme Court of the United States its judges said indignantly, "We will not follow the oscillations of a State court; we will not immolate truth, justice, and law, though a State court has erected the altar and decreed the sacrifice."

Now, I trust that when the honest and fair-minded lawyers on that side of the House are asked to set aside the time-honored rule which has been followed by every Congress heretofore respecting the decisions of a State court; when they are again asked to trample upon the rules of legal evidence; when they are asked to take as testimony the certificate of a clerk who was not authorized by law to certify about the matter in issue; when they are asked to lay down one set of rules which will turn out a member from Florida and immediately turn around and reverse those rules in order to turn out a member from Mississippi; when they are asked to take the tally-stick of a Republican partisan against the sworn returns of Democratic officers of elections, I trust that there may be some at least upon that side, some honest lawyers, who will answer in the same indignant spirit of the supreme court—we will not immolate truth, justice, and law, though party has erected the altar and decreed the sacrifice.

But, if I am mistaken; if reason and shame have fled to brutish beasts; if the sacrifice of Democrats—and a hecatomb seems to be prepared—if the sacrifice of Democrats is to be made and I am to be the first victim, then I say to you so be it; you have the power if you choose to exercise it. Let your guillotine fall; you will regret it more than I. If you commit this outrage, I say to you, you may drive me from my seat by force; you may place another in it; and yet whenever you look at him you will be reminded of this day's outrage. Whenever he speaks to you his voice will bring back to you the recollection of this day; and if conscience be not "but a canker" in your breast, in the silence of the night it will hound you with the recollection that truth, justice, and law were immolated, and that you were the high priests who officiated at the unholy sacrifice. [Applause.]

Mr. DE MOTTE. Mr. Speaker, it has been often times said, and is worthy of being said again, that the American people are always willing to be governed by a majority, and that it does not matter how small the majority may be, so that it is a fair one. Want of fairness in any of our elections on the part of any party is a thing which ought to receive, and I believe does receive, the condemnation of the whole people, if properly understood.

There is something in connection with this "Shoestring district," and everything pertaining to it, which suggests continually to me the idea of unfairness. If some intelligent man, knowing nothing whatever about the politics of this country, should take a view of the map of Mississippi, with the Congressional districts as now arranged made plainly visible upon it, he would at one glance make up his mind, if he was a fair man, that there was something wrong in the construction of what is known as the "Shoestring district." I say again, he need know nothing whatever about our election machinery other than the fact that this State had been divided with the view of a representation somewhere.

Mr. HOUSE. Will the gentleman yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. DE MOTTE. I would do so very readily, but the House would hardly agree to it. I shall only occupy a few moments at any rate. What makes the conformation of this district peculiar and remarkable to us is, we know, that the larger part of a certain class of people belonging in the State of Mississippi are found within it. Hence those of us who know the situation feel all the time, when viewing the shape of the district, that this strip, forty miles in width and five hundred in length, was made for a political purpose—a purpose which was not a fair one.

We all know that when a State is divided for representative purposes, the proper mode is to have the divisions embrace as nearly as may be contiguous territory. Therefore when we see a district thus laid out, knowing as we do our own political machinery, we are very apt to judge in advance that the party in power had some evil end to accomplish.

There has been no time since the war when there has not been trouble and complaint in regard to the elections held in that district or its immediate neighborhood. I am not here to-day to arraign particularly any party or any man in connection with these evils; but that they have existed ever since the district was formed, that they have been continuously paraded here by contests and throughout the country on account of the frauds alleged to have been committed, cannot be denied. Hence it seems to me that there has been unfairness, not only in the making of this district, but in the manner in which elections have been conducted there.

By the returns of the Democratic election officers there were but 14,565 votes polled at the last election in that district. The gentleman returned as elected has 9,172 votes. Now I remember very well that the candidate who was unsuccessful in my district received about twice that many votes. What is the matter in Mississippi? Why is it that, with a population equal to that of any other district in the United States, only about half the average number of voters is required to elect a member? I have prepared a table, which I will print in connection with my remarks, showing the average number of votes which it takes to elect a member of Congress in the various States of this Union. This table is based upon a House of Representatives of 325 members, and upon the election returns of 1880:

Alabama	18,938	Mississippi	16,839
Arkansas	21,245	Missouri	28,377
California	27,370	Nebraska	29,118
Colorado	52,532	Nevada	18,343
Connecticut	33,285	New Hampshire	43,181
Delaware	29,353	New Jersey	35,132
Florida	25,809	New York	32,488
Georgia	15,865	North Carolina	26,675
Illinois	31,115	Ohio	34,522
Indiana	36,205	Oregon	40,816
Iowa	29,396	Pennsylvania	31,242
Kansas	28,717	Rhode Island	14,617
Kentucky	24,027	South Carolina	24,422
Louisiana	16,260	Tennessee	24,182
Maine	35,963	Texas	21,962
Maryland	28,703	Vermont	32,549
Massachusetts	23,542	Virginia	21,161
Michigan	32,040	West Virginia	28,178
Minnesota	30,954	Wisconsin	29,685

It appears that the average vote to elect a member of Congress in the various States is 28,335, nearly twice as many as were cast for both candidates in the "Shoestring district" at the election of 1880. The average of the State of Mississippi is 16,839, some 12,000 below the average in the other States, and in this particular district the vote is about 14,000 less than the average of the State. The population of Mississippi in 1880 was 1,131,597; the vote polled there was 117,078. This is but one for every 9.6 inhabitants.

For the sake of contrast let us compare these statistics with the State of Indiana. I know we Republicans have been in the habit in the past of charging our Democratic friends with bringing from Kentucky, where they have a great Democratic margin which they do not need, enough votes to carry the day. When we are successful they return the charge by saying that as the northern end of the State is largely Republican, we draw on our Republican neighbors of Illinois and Michigan for votes in an emergency. Whether there be any truth in that or not, I do not care to say, but I am satisfied with one fact, that in 1880 the election was entirely fair, for no Democratic electioneerer was allowed to go anywhere without a Republican followed him, to watch every movement he made. And vice versa. The two parties watched each other continually, and I think both Democrats and Republicans came out of the contest with tolerably clean hands. I know it was a large vote, for we brought all we had to the polls. If a man was sick we had him ready when the polls were opened, for fear he might die during the day. [Laughter.] We voted them early but not often, and took care that every man who was entitled to vote voted.

In Indiana it takes 36,200 votes to elect a member of Congress; that is, one vote for every 4.2 inhabitants. It is rather a remarkable vote, but, as I have said, we were very industrious on both sides.

But some may say that is not a fair comparison, because in Mississippi there is a large margin one way, that it is not a closely-contested State like Indiana. Very well; let us go to Iowa, where they scarcely have Democrats enough left for mournful examples. [Laughter.] There the Republicans have it all their own way, and a comparison would certainly be fair. In Iowa it takes 29,396 votes to elect a member of Congress. That is one vote for every five inhabitants. There is no contest there, as I said before, yet one in every five asserts his right to vote, while in Mississippi, where there has been a contest, as I understand, one side led by a colored man, and the other by a brass band and a wagon with all the colors of the United States on it, [laughter,] and yet but one in 9.6 of the inhabitants exercised their right to vote.

What is the reason of this? Do men care less for their rights there than in Iowa or other States? I would think not after hearing the earnest speeches made by the two gentlemen claiming seats in this House here to-day. It is clear to me that if there are not more voters in Mississippi than the Democratic election officers have returned, one of two propositions is true: there is a great disproportion of women and children in that State or an unfair apportionment.

There is another thing, Mr. Speaker, which I think will aid us in getting an understanding of the situation in this district.

In 1880, as I am informed by gentlemen from that State, a census was taken with a view of legislative apportionment. They base that apportionment on the number of electors. They would be in a sad way if some of the counties were apportioned according to the number of men who asserted their rights at the polls. That census shows there were 240,391 electors in the State of Mississippi in 1880. Out of that number only 117,078 voted, leaving 123,313, a majority of all, who never even attempted to exercise their right of suffrage. The "Shoestring district" now under consideration contained by the same census 46,424 electors, and yet our Democratic returning officers tell us but 14,565 voted—less than one-third of the number.

I think the truth of this matter as it is gathered from the evidence in this contest is that more men voted in that district than these election officers returned. About 21,000 men voted, which is still less than one-half the number that rightfully belonged there, and for some reason over one-fourth of those votes have not been counted. And yet the contestee appeals to us to-day to look at the record and be guided solely by it.

Very well, let us look at it. Who makes that record he is so anxious we shall rely on? At every precinct in that district the election was controlled by Democratic officials. He and his friends had all the machinery of the election in their own hands. There was no one to say nay. The record shows that they organized the election boards, received the votes offered, counted those which were for Chalmers, and threw out those for Lynch. It is their record, not ours; and I see no reason why we should be bound by it.

I do not know how this may look to other gentlemen, but to me there seems an unusual amount of assurance in the contestee standing here before this intelligent body and after having made this record without allowing us anything to say and demanding that we shall all measure ourselves by it. I do not attribute to the gentleman any unworthy means, but I do say, when his friends had it all in their own power and when they deliberately made, not false returns, but useless returns, when they failed to do their duty, failed to make the returns required by law, and then refused to count the votes because of these irregularities, it comes with bad grace from him to demand of us to acquiesce.

And another remarkable fact about the matter is, that every one of the boxes thrown out were Republican boxes. Now, how easy such a scheme is to organize and carry out. You would simply have to make a mistake, and mistakes are not criminal; we are all liable to make them. They could be made in the places where the vote was against us, and by the letter of the law which is appealed to to-day they could be thrown out. I shall not charge that there has been a conspiracy to do this, but the evidence and circumstances attending this election would fully justify me in so charging.

But we are told there are not so many Republican voters in this district as was supposed. The minority of the committee in their report seem to chuckle over this statement as if it were very pleasant to contemplate.

The contestee alluded to that in his speech with a great deal of gratification, and went on to say how the immense Republican majority of a few years ago had, in his opinion, been dissipated. Of course it was not on account of any unwarranted and unlawful means made use of by the Democrats, but because the Republicans quarreled among themselves. He alleged that there was no longer a Republican majority there.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us look at this a little more closely. If it be true that the Republicans have not a majority there, what is the necessity of throwing out Republican boxes at each election? If they can just as well carry the district by "painted wagons" and "colored bands," as contestee alleges he carried it this time, allowing every colored man to have his own way and to vote according to his sense of justice and right, what is the necessity for carrying it by throwing out Republican votes?

Does it not seem reasonable, in view of their claim here, that they might just as well have carried the district in a fair manner, and saved the odium of the unusual, unjust, and unseemly means the evidence shows they did resort to?

But we are told these ballots are marked and violate the statute of Mississippi. This is the ballot:

REPUBLICAN NATIONAL TICKET.

For President,

JAMES A. GARFIELD.

For Vice-President,

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

For Electors for President and Vice-President,

HON. WILLIAM R. SPEARS.

HON. R. W. FLOURNOY

DR. J. M. BYNUM,

HON. J. T. STETTLE

CAPT. M. K. MISTER, JR.,

DR. R. H. MONTGOMERY,

JUDGE R. H. CUNY,

HON. CHARLES W CLARKE

For Member of the House of Representatives from the 6th Congressional District.

JOHN R. LYNCH

The law of Mississippi reads as follows:

SEC. 137. All ballots shall be written or printed in black ink, with a space not less than one-fifth of an inch between each name, on plain white printing newspaper, not more than two and one-half, nor less than two and one-fourth, inches wide, without any device or mark by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another, except the words at the head of the ticket; but this shall not prohibit the erasure, correction, or insertion of any name by pencil mark or ink upon the face of the ballot; and a ticket different from that herein prescribed shall not be received or counted.

The commissioners of election refused to count these ballots because of the dashes under "Republican National Ticket," "James A. Garfield," "Chester A. Arthur," and "Hon. Charles W. Clarke."

The supreme court of Mississippi sustained the commissioners in their action, and say:

The only safe guide as to what ballots are illegal because of devices or marks is the statute. It excludes any mark or device by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another. A distinction between ballots by means of devices or marks instead of by means of the names on them is what the statute aims to prevent, and we are not at liberty to confine the broad language of the statute to any particular description of devices or marks, for ingenuity would evade any such limit. The law should be enforced as written.

Now, I have always had, and hope I shall continue to have, the greatest respect for the judgment of the highest tribunal of a State. I am compelled to say that I have but little respect for the decision of the supreme court of Mississippi in this matter, very little, indeed; and the reason is that they based their decision (for I cannot go into a discussion of all the points involved) upon a doctrine which, to my knowledge, has never before been announced. They say the object of having the ballots uniform is not only to protect the secret of the voter, but that intelligence shall guide him.

Now, mark you, according to this decision they must take from the ballot everything that an ignorant man can recognize, in order that intelligence may guide him. The intelligence of whom? His own or that of some one else? I think I can see in this a cunningly devised plan, calculated to make the ignorant voter who is dependent upon some other man rely upon him as to how he shall vote, while there is no means of ascertaining whether his friend tells the truth or not. Now, there had been tickets which had something on them that enabled an ignorant man to know what he was doing. They had possibly a spread eagle, a flag, or something of that kind, which appealed to such intelligence as he had. But this new-found law says that there shall be nothing upon it which the intelligence of the voter can recognize, and gives as a reason that "intelligence shall guide" the voter. Therefore I am forced to conclude that it was the intelligence of some other man and not the intelligence of the voter which was to be appealed to.

But are gentlemen on the other side of the House willing to go as far as that decision goes? That decision says—and I shall not undertake to quote it exactly—that any mark, whether intentional or unintentional, whether fraudulent or innocent, upon a ballot, that will enable anybody to tell it from any other ballot, shall vitiate it. I understand that to be the sum and substance of the decision. And I ask gentlemen if they will carry that doctrine out to its furthest extent? Are they prepared to say that the ballot of the honest coal-heaver, for instance, who comes from his hod with his hands begrimed and blackened by his labor, and in handling the ticket shall deface it or besmear it so that it might be picked out from among other tickets, shall not be counted? And yet if you go as far as the supreme court of Mississippi goes you must say so.

And again, suppose by some accident any blot, blur, or mark, no matter how small, for its size is not material, or even if some wandering fly deposits a speck upon it, by which some man on examining would be able to recognize it as different from some other ballot, will you claim that it should also be excluded? The supreme court of Mississippi have so decided, and we are appealed to to govern our action in this matter by the terms of that decision.

No, Mr. Speaker, the trouble with that judgment, in my opinion, lies here, that the same motives actuated these men clad in judicial ermine that actuated the men who made their election returns in such shape that they could not be counted.

I fear the same spirit which has been mentioned here to-day by both speakers, which says that a certain element shall control whether or no, had something to do in dictating that decision. I have always had the ordinary respect for punctuation marks which a boy carefully taught to read would have. I have seen sentences curiously devised, so that by the removal of a comma or placing it in a different position it gave an entirely different meaning to the sentence. Those were literary curiosities, and I have admired them. But I never thought the time would come when a punctuation mark would deprive a citizen of the highest right he has in this Government. I never thought the time would come when a mere matter of punctuation would be urged in this House why the people of Mississippi should not be represented by the man of their choice. And although a punctuation mark is a small thing and does not deserve much attention, yet I think I would be justified in saying to the gentleman who is now occupying that seat, that there are certain other punctuation marks which will some times appear when they are not wanted; and that there is one that will hang over that seat so long as he occupies it; that there is a punctuation mark that will appear there to every fair and honorable and truth-loving man all over the land so long as he sits there, and that mark is an interrogation point—[laughter]—appealing to him, appealing to us, appealing to everybody, why is it that he sits there claiming a seat upon a mere mistake having been made by a voter?

It has been suggested behind me that possibly a period would be put there. That suggested another thought to me. In looking over the law of Mississippi I find no allusion to anything except letters on the ballot. There is no provision for punctuation whatever. Will the gentlemen go still further and say that a period after one of those names shall be a designating mark? Will they say that of the commas which appeared there, because they are no more mentioned in the law than the dashes which the gentleman has made so much of? They are all one and the same thing, put there for the same purpose, and are not such, it seems to me, as any reasonable, fair-minded man would for one moment stop to consider.

Mr. Speaker, I have this to say by way of conclusion: the great mass of the people of this country believe that every qualified voter should be allowed to go to the polls unmolested and cast his vote for whomsoever he pleases, and that his vote shall be counted. Everything connected with this election, from the passage of the statute concerning the ballot, if this statute is properly construed by the supreme court of Mississippi, to the issuing of the certificate to the sitting member, plainly shows to me that those having the administration of the law in their hands have sought anything else than a full, free, and fair vote, and no word or vote of mine shall help in giving any advantage to such a conspiracy. [Applause.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CALKINS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to submit a resolution which I have shown to the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and which has his approval.

Mr. CALKINS. I will withdraw the motion to adjourn for the present to allow the gentleman from Pennsylvania and other gentlemen to make some requests for unanimous consent.

SECOND NATIONAL BANK OF CINCINNATI.

Mr. RANDALL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and adopted:

Whereas the charter of the Second National Bank of Cincinnati will expire on or about the 25th day of May, next; and

Whereas it is alleged that said bank has gone into liquidation and has reorganized to continue its existence as a corporation under existing law: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Comptroller of the Currency is hereby directed to communicate to this House any correspondence between him and the officers of the said bank in relation to said liquidation and reorganization, and to inform this House under what existing statutes said reorganization was authorized; and, further, to communicate the manner and form prescribed of such reorganization by national banks.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPRINT OF GENEVA AWARD BILL AND REPORT.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I ask the House for an order to have printed an additional number of the report of the committee on what is known as the Geneva award bill. There are none left. I have had a number of applications for them, and a number of applications have been made to other members, and it is desirable to have some additional copies printed.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Let the bill also be printed.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio requests that the Geneva award bill and accompanying report be reprinted. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. ATKINS, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of W. C. Marsh, now before the Committee on War Claims, there being no adverse report thereon.

CONDITION OF FOLDING-ROOM.

Mr. HAWK. I desire to submit for reference to the Committee on Accounts a resolution of inquiry as to the condition of the folding-room.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be instructed to inquire into the sanitary condition of the House folding-room, and to report whether the same is not detrimental to the health of those employed therein.

Be it further resolved, That if said committee shall find said folding-room unfit for human habitation, they are hereby instructed to inquire into and report upon what terms more suitable quarters can be obtained.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Why should the gentleman propose to refer the resolution to the Committee on Accounts? The more appropriate committee would be that which has charge of the heating and ventilating of this building.

Mr. HAWK. I believe it is usual to send resolutions of this kind to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think also it would be well to have the committee consider whether this Capitol is not in great danger by having so large an amount of printed matter in the basement of this building, and whether it could not be advantageously removed to some other place.

Mr. HAWK. It is immaterial to me what committee shall make this examination.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is the proper committee to be charged with the matter of obtaining other rooms. If it is a question as to proper ventilation, it would properly go to the Committee on Ventilation.

Mr. HAWK. It is immaterial to me which committee is charged with the duty. I desire to state that there are forty-two persons employed as folders, &c., in that dark, unhealthy place; a place so unfit that no member on this floor would be willing to keep a good horse or mule in it. I think this is a matter of great importance, a matter of absolute necessity. It is immaterial to me what committee the subject may be referred to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. These persons have been on duty in the place referred to for some time, and I have heard of no mortality among them resulting from it.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I have given some personal attention to the condition of things in the folding-room, and I have called the attention of the Architect of the Capitol to the very unhealthy and improper condition of that room. I quite agree with the gentleman who offers this resolution [Mr. HAWK] that this matter demands prompt attention on the score of humanity. But it strikes me that the Committee on Accounts is hardly the proper committee to attend to it.

The SPEAKER. The resolution might be amended so as to direct the Select Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics to examine the subject.

Mr. HAWK. I have no objection to that modification.

The resolutions as modified were then adopted.

Mr. HAWK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEW ALBANY NATIONAL CEMETERY.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to this House the correspondence and papers on file in his office touching the construction of a road from the limits of the city of New Albany, Indiana, to the National Soldiers' Cemetery, situated near said city.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I desire to state that my purpose in offering this resolution is to obtain these papers for reference to the Committee on Appropriations, with a view to securing the necessary appropriation.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PATRICK CASEY.

Mr. PEELLE, from the Committee on Claims, by unanimous consent, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3692) for the relief of Patrick Casey, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

WAGON-ROAD IN OREGON.

Mr. STRAIT, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which had been referred Executive Document No. 97, relating to a grant of land to aid in the construction of a wagon-road in the State of Oregon, reported the same back and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

HEIRS OF M. HALLIBURTON.

Mr. SIMONTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6009) to pay the heirs of M. Halliburton for property taken and used during the war; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF POTOMAC FLATS.

Mr. BOWMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6010) to remove all the Potomac flats from the Washington Harbor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

ARLINGTON MILITARY CEMETERY.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 3140, a bill (H. R. No. 6011) to improve the public road from the Aqueduct Bridge near Georgetown, District of Columbia, to the Arlington National Military Cemetery; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL CEMETERY AT RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 3138, a bill (H. R. No. 6012) to construct a road from the city of Richmond to the Richmond National Military Cemetery; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

COMPENSATION OF UNITED STATES DISTRICT ATTORNEYS.

Mr. HUMPHREY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 16, a bill (H. R. No. 6013) fixing the compensation of United States district attorneys, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PAYMENTS FOR MILITARY SERVICES.

Mr. BAYNE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 4618) approving payments made for military services rendered between April 19, 1861, and August 20, 1866, under orders from the War Department; which was placed upon the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. VALENTINE. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 4466) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, be taken from the Speaker's table. The bill has been returned from the Senate, that body insisting upon its amendments disagreed to by the House. I move that the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the conference asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. VALENTINE of Nebraska, Mr. RICH of Michigan, and Mr. HATCH of Missouri.

LAWLESSNESS IN ARIZONA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a message from the President of the United States; which was read, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

By recent information received from official and other sources I am advised that an alarming state of disorder continues to exist within the Territory of Arizona, and that lawlessness has already gained such head there as to require a resort to extraordinary means to repress it.

The governor of the Territory, under date of the 31st ultimo, reports that violence and anarchy prevail, particularly in Cochise County and along the Mexican border; that robbery, murder, and resistance to law have become so common as to cease causing surprise; and that the people are greatly intimidated and losing confidence in the protection of the law. I transmit his communication herewith, and call especial attention thereto.

In a telegram from the General of the Army, dated at Tucson, Arizona, on the 11th instant, herewith transmitted, that officer states that he hears of lawlessness and disorders which seem well attested, and that the civil officers have not sufficient force to make arrests and hold the prisoners for trial or punish them when convicted.

Much of this disorder is caused by armed bands of desperadoes known as cowboys, by whom depredations are not only committed within the Territory but it is alleged predatory incursions are made therefrom into Mexico. In my message to Congress at the beginning of the present session I called attention to the existence of these bands, and suggested that the setting on foot within our own territory of brigandage and armed marauding expeditions against friendly nations and their citizens be made punishable as an offense against the United States. I renew this suggestion.

To effectually repress the lawlessness prevailing within the Territory, a prompt execution of the process of the courts and vigorous enforcement of the laws against offenders are needed. This the civil authorities there are unable to do without the aid of other means and forces than they can now avail themselves of. To meet the present exigencies the governor asks that provision be made by Congress to enable him to employ and maintain temporarily a volunteer militia force to aid the civil authorities, the members of which force to be invested with the same powers and authority as are conferred by the laws of the Territory upon peace officers thereof.

On the ground of economy as well as effectiveness, however, it appears to me to be more advisable to permit the co-operation with the civil authorities of a part of the Army as a posse comitatus. Believing that this, in addition to such use of the Army as may be made under the powers already conferred by section 5298, Revised Statutes, would be adequate to secure the accomplishment of the ends in view, I again call the attention of Congress to the expediency of so amending section 15 of the act of June 18, 1878, chapter 263, as to allow the military forces to be employed as a posse comitatus to assist the civil authorities within a Territory to execute the laws therein. This use of the Army, as I have in my former message observed, would not seem to be within the alleged evil against which that legislation was aimed.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 26, 1882.

Mr. PAGE. I move that this message, with the accompanying documents, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and printed; and I ask unanimous consent that the committee be authorized to report at any time on this subject.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope that the authority suggested by the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] will be given. From personal visits to the part of the country referred to in this message I have some knowledge of the outrages perpetrated there. I know that Indian outbreaks and other disturbances of the public peace are now producing consternation and anarchy in a large portion of the territory of the United States. Up to this time there seems to be no adequate defense for the settlers in that region. A year ago I visited the flourishing town of Galeyville, in Arizona, and remained there a week, among an intelligent and industrious community. By telegrams which have been published yesterday and to-day I learn that that town has been sacked and burned, and thirty of its inhabitants slaughtered in cold blood by bands of Indians. Something should be done to protect our frontier and the brave people who have gone there. In many localities there seems to be utter inability on the part of the civil authorities to deal with the existing disturbances. I hope the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] will be granted, and that the Committee on Military Affairs may have leave to report on this subject at any time, so that Congress may take action in the matter promptly.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the message and accompanying documents will be ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, with leave to report at any time.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

NATIONAL EXHIBITION AT BOSTON IN 1883.

Mr. CANDLER, (by request,) by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6014) to admit free of duty articles intended for the exhibition of art and industry to be held at Boston, Massachusetts, during the year 1883; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CHAPMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6015) to provide for the correction of certificates of assessment issued for assessments for special improvements in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

IRRIGATION OF SNAKE RIVER VALLEY, IDAHO.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ALLISON. I present a petition numerously signed by citizens of Davenport, Iowa, representing commercial interests, merchants, manufacturers, &c., praying for the passage of what is known as the Lowell bankrupt bill. I move that it lie on the table.

Mr. ALLISON presented a petition of citizens of Vinton, Iowa; a petition of citizens of Grundy Centre, Iowa; a petition of citizens of Belle Plaine, Iowa; a petition of citizens of Sibley, Iowa; a petition of citizens of Davis County, Iowa; and a petition of citizens of Leon, Iowa, in favor of an appropriation for the establishment and maintenance of schools in Alaska; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. ROLLINS. I present a petition of David Smith and some 350 others, citizens of Georgetown, District of Columbia, praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 419, concerning the construction of a free bridge across the Potomac River. As the prayer is very short, I would like to have it read; it is only a few lines.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be read without the names, the Chair hearing no objection.

The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, as follows:

> The undersigned, inhabitants of Georgetown, District of Columbia, being deeply interested in the construction of a free bridge across the Potomac River, at a point where the same can be done not only with the greatest economy but where the public interest will be best subserved, respectfully petition that Senate bill No. 419, now pending before the Senate Committee of the District of Columbia, be speedily passed; inasmuch as the Aqueduct piers, constructed at a large cost, are in excellent condition, and the site of the Aqueduct is in every respect the most suitable location for a free bridge, the present military road to Arlington and the national cemetery passing over it, and in connection with already established roads leading to the adjacent producing counties in Virginia.

O. D. CONGER,
WM. P. FRYE,
J. R. MCPHERSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

AMOS TOWNSEND,
S. S. COX,
JOHN W. CANDLER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CONGER. I will state to the Senate that the bill as passed by this body with its amendments, with two or three exceptions, was adopted by the conference committee. All the amendments of the Senate, except some two or three stations named in the Senate amendments, were acceded to by the conference committee and by the House. The two sections regarding the payment of wages to surfmen laboring under disabilities, and to their wives and families in case of their death from injuries received, inserted by the Senate, are adopted in this report. The last clauses are merely in reference to the changes of the numbering of the sections. The Senate conferees agreed to recede from the amendment fixing a station at or near Fort Morgan, on the bay of Mobile, to limit the number of life-saving stations on the Atlantic coast of Florida from three to two, to strike out a station at or near Cape Canaveral, and to make two life-saving stations on the coast of South Carolina, to be located by the General Superintendent at or near the ports of Georgetown and Charleston instead of three, striking out the Beaufort station. With that statement I think all the essential changes in the bill have been mentioned.

I will state the reason for striking out the two places mentioned here, one at or near Fort Morgan, on the bay of Mobile, and the other at Beaufort. We find by an examination of the reports that in the last eleven years there have been near Fort Morgan, within any circle where a station there could be useful, but four casualties, four strandings of vessels, and no loss of life. As to a station at Beaufort provided for in one of the Senate amendments, we find that in eleven years there have been within the range of service which could be useful there but two strandings of vessels and no lives lost. There were so many places upon the coast where more casualties occurred and where life had been lost, which the committee had not recommended and could not recommend for life-saving stations, that the Senate conferees unanimously thought it was proper to agree to the House proposition to strike out those two places. The other stations all remain as they were adopted in the Senate, with the exception that the amendment is made that stations may be established "at or near" instead of "at" the places named, so that the Superintendent may make the selection near the places mentioned instead of at the places.

I have stated all the changes which have been made in the bill as it passed the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. This conference report ought to be printed and laid before the Senate. From the reading of it at the Clerk's desk it is impossible to comprehend and remember the points made in this extensive report.

Mr. CONGER. I have stated the only changes in regard to stations and I have explained why those were not agreed to be left in the bill. One is the station at Beaufort, where there had been but two casualties in the last eleven years and no lives lost, and one at or near Fort Morgan, on the bay of Mobile, where there had been in eleven years but four strandings of vessels and no lives lost, the smallest number of any of the places which were proposed. The conferees have agreed to all the other amendments of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. Without any alteration?

Mr. CONGER. Without any alteration as to the places, except to authorize the Superintendent of the service to determine a place "near," instead of "at," as the bill had it, inserting the words "or near" after "at;" and the House receded from its disagreement with the amendment as to appointments with a change that assistant superintendents and keepers, as well as surfmen, should be appointed without reference to their political relations.

I have stated all the changes, I think, that are made in the bill as it passed the Senate. The salaries are all kept the same, and all the places put in for stations or for houses of refuge remain the same, with the exception that there is one less house of refuge provided for, and the stations I have mentioned are omitted.

Mr. MORGAN. I am still unable to understand the entire extent of the changes made in this bill by the conference committee, because I have not been able to hear distinctly all that the Senator from Michigan said; but I will take it for granted that nothing has been changed of a material character, except the stations on the coast of Florida and the one at Fort Morgan, in the bay of Mobile.

Now, I object to that change, and the reason given by the Senator in charge of the bill is not sufficient in my judgment to warrant the Senate in receding from the vote by which it ordered a life-saving station to be placed at Fort Morgan, on the bay of Mobile.

The legislation of the Congress of the United States is getting to be controlled very largely by conference committees. They yield certain amendments which are not agreeable to the gentlemen who happen to be upon the committees, and in conference committees bills oftener than otherwise are shaped directly against the sense of the Senate, I know, and sometimes against the sense of the House expressed after long and deliberate debate. I do not regard this as a constitutional method of legislation. I do not believe either House has the right to delegate to a select committee to meet together and reform a bill contrary to the wishes expressed and the votes taken in the respective bodies.

I had the honor to propose an amendment to this bill when it was before the Senate, providing that a life-saving station should be established at Fort Morgan, and I called the attention of the Senate to the fact that there was not a life-saving station between Key West and Galveston, and there is none yet. There is none at Port Eads; there is none anywhere on the coast of Louisiana; none on the coast of Alabama; none on the western coast of Florida; none on the coast of Mississippi.

It is said that the recommendation of this committee is based on the fact that the reports do not show more than four wrecks near Mobile at that point within the last seven years. Well, the reports are not reliable. These reports are made, I suppose, unofficially. I do not know how they are made; but they are made by men who take no pains to get up the data in respect to the necessity of such establishments, and the Congress of the United States against the protestation of a Senator and, as I notice, the entire solid vote of the State of Alabama in the House, sees proper to allow a conference committee to strike out a life-saving station on that immense circuit of sea-coast reaching from Key West to Galveston, where there is not one station now to be found.

The Senator from Michigan says that there having been no loss of life there the last seven years, that is the best reason for not having a life-saving station there. We must wait there until some great sea tragedy occurs and ships are wrecked and lives are lost before we commence to extend our watchful care in the preservation of life. Somebody must be killed, some ship must be wrecked, some great disaster must occur before the Congress of the United States can see the necessity of putting this protection to commerce at the mouth of Mobile Bay, or at the mouth of the Mississippi River, or at Pensacola Bay, or Tampa Bay, or Cedar Keys, or anywhere else on the Gulf coast. Wrecks do occur not only outside but inside the bay of Mobile, whereby vessels are lost and whereby lives are lost, and the Government of the United States, while expending $600,000 or more than that for the protection of life in other parts of the coast of the North and Northeast, refuses to vote one dollar to establish a life-saving station on the Gulf of Mexico, and the conference committee go very quietly, because they have got as much as they want, and yield up this little demand made in behalf of the bay of Mobile.

Now, sir, I want the Senate to act on that question. I do not propose to have the rights of my people bartered away by a conference committee merely because it suits its members, because they are willing to yield all we get, having secured to themselves all that they claim in the bill. That is not fair legislation; it is not right.

I claim to have as sound a judgment in reference to the coast of my State as any Senator can have in reference to the coast of his own State and the necessities thereof, and I do not come before the Senate of the United States merely to get an establishment upon the coast of Alabama to spend a little money on. I come for the purpose of participating in this right you have undertaken to guarantee the coast of the United States at large for the security of property and of life through the Life-Saving Service. If the Life-Saving Service is worth having at all, it is worth as much to the commercial communities on one coast as on another. Here is an enormous commerce in the Gulf of Mexico, coming to and from Galveston, to and from the mouth of the Mississippi River, to and from the various bays along the coast, including Mobile and Pensacola and other places. It must necessarily have some effect upon the price of insurance that there are no life-saving stations on that coast, that there are no arrangements on that coast by which property can be saved from a sinking ship. By silent neglect you expose our commerce to danger without furnishing to us any of the protection that you furnish at such large expense for yourselves.

I hope there will not be a ship sunk or a life lost in the bay of Mobile in the next twenty-five years; but if lives should be lost and ships sunk on that coast, which is a dangerous coast, a very treacherous coast, the Congress of the United States will have itself to blame for not having heeded the words of admonition which I had the honor to address to the Senate in calling their attention to the necessity of this establishment.

The point upon which Fort Morgan stands at the entrance of the bay of Mobile is nearly fifty miles from Mobile, nearly fifty miles out at sea from that city. Can it be said that the Government of the United States in providing for life-saving stations has no duty laid upon it to have some arrangement there by which life may be saved in the event of disaster? That is the principle on which this bill ought to proceed; not to wait until after lives have been lost and ships destroyed, and then come in and say "Because this has happened, hereafter we will establish a life-saving station in that quarter." Wherever there are seas, especially southern seas, such as the waters of the Gulf of Mexico, which are liable to sudden, terrible storms, which, as I remarked when I had the honor to address the Senate on this bill before, had even driven the entire population from islands lying out from the seaboard, it seems to me that it is our duty to provide in advance, while other portions of the country are being provided for, at least some protection, some arrangement by which we can anticipate such dangers and their evil consequences as far as possible.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, while this bill was being considered by the Senate, I voted for the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama. I did so, believing that it was a proper thing to place a life-saving station at the point named in his amendment. I was afterward appointed one of the conference committee of the Senate to meet a like committee of the House of Representatives with respect to the disagreements between the Houses on the bill. We found it impossible to get the concurrence of the House committee to all the amendments made in the Senate, and therefore some compromise was necessary. One of the objections strongly urged in the committee of conference was that there had been no wrecks on the Gulf coast, particularly at or near the point mentioned in the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama. I investigated the subject to this extent: I took the coast of New Jersey, and also the Long Island coast, and I found that in a period of ten years, during that portion of the year when it is not considered necessary to maintain the life-saving stations along the coast, namely, during the months of June, July, August, and September, when the life-saving crews are dismissed, when there is no supervision of the coast at all, there had been in the ten years just expired something like ten times more wrecks on both the New Jersey and Long Island coasts than there had been on the entire Gulf coast within the district in which this life-saving station was proposed to be located.

Mr. MORGAN. I will say to the Senator, if he will allow me, that the Congress of the United States has encouraged more ships to go to Long Island, and discouraged more from going to Mobile and the Gulf of Mexico than would account for that difference.

Mr. MCPHERSON. That can hardly be an argument in this case. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to extend the Life-Saving Service everywhere that it will be of benefit; but the Senator is aware that with a long-extended sea-coast it is impossible for this Government to maintain life-saving stations at every point where it may be the pleasure of a Senator or a member of Congress to ask that one be established. If there is any reason in the world why a station should be established at Fort Morgan, in the Gulf of Mexico, there are four times the reasons why the stations should be maintained the whole year round on the coasts of Massachusetts, Long Island, and New Jersey. If the Government can appropriate an unlimited amount of money for the purpose of maintaining these establishments, then let us locate them everywhere where seemingly there may be a necessity for their use. I am informed that on the Gulf coast scarcely ever a vessel is lost. The nature of the coast on the Gulf is such that you do not have the heavy storms that we have on the Atlantic coast, and therefore there is no special necessity for them there.

I concurred in the report of the committee of conference simply because I thought that if there was a necessity for a station at Fort Morgan there was an additional necessity for maintaining them the whole year round along the whole Atlantic seaboard. There was no disposition on the part of the committee, and seemingly there has been none evinced by either the House or the Senate, to very largely increase the appropriation for maintaining and establishing the life-saving stations. Therefore there was no provision in the bill so fitting on which we should commence our reduction as the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, we have not asked for the charity of the Senate heretofore, and that is not a proper basis of legislation on such a subject; but the idea of yielding something to others when you have got yourself all you asked for never seemed to suggest itself to the conference committee. Sometimes it will work its way through political pressure, perhaps, on the minds of gentlemen after debate on the floor of the Senate, where the discussion is open and questions can be put and answered; but in the secret conclave of a conference committee, where no one is admitted but the committee themselves and their own peculiar views, of course it is an easy matter to have things your own way. The Senator from New Jersey says that the particular reason why the committee did not make any appropriation for this thousand miles of Gulf coast, reaching from Key West to Galveston, was that if you put a station at all on that Gulf coast a greater necessity exists for keeping up stations all the year round on the eastern coast. I do not believe in the logic of that, or if it be logic, I do not perceive the justice of it. The justice and logic of that proposition rest on the idea that if ships come into the Gulf of Mexico and are wrecked they must be wrecked, and no provision made for saving cargo or life; they must be wrecked, because it happens at a time of year when there should have been a station at this point, that point, and the other point on the coast of Long Island, or the coast of New Jersey. You have suffered, it is true, but the reason you are allowed to suffer is that at the same time we have been exposed to very great sufferings ourselves!

Now, take up the life-saving stations on the coast of the United States, including the Northern lakes, and compare the appropriations on the lakes, those quiet waters, with the appropriations for the coast from Charleston around to the Rio Grande, and it would shock the conscience of any man who did not bend his mind to the purpose of getting out of this Government all he could for the benefit of a certain class and exclude others from any advantages whatever. I understand the Life-Saving Service to be one of the adjuncts of commerce. I understand that we maintain the Life-Saving Service because we wish to encourage commerce on our coast as well as to protect life. We want to secure the maritime men against the loss of their property in case of wreck or disaster. The Constitution of the United States says that Congress in legislating on subjects of this kind shall not discriminate in favor of or against the ports of any State. If the history of the Life-Saving Service, so far as it has any relationship to commerce, is not a history of discrimination against all the Southern coast, then I confess that I have read it without understanding it. It is an unjust discrimination. Is there another thousand miles of sea-coast anywhere, unless it may be in Alaska, belonging to the United States, where there is no pretense made of any provision for the saving of life or commerce?

I called the attention of the Senate, when this bill was before it, to the large number of wrecks that had occurred in the last decade, reported in the last annual report before the present one on this subject. Now we have no additional reports; we shall not get any additional reports. It makes no difference how many ships may sink in the Gulf of Mexico or upon the shores thereof, we shall get no report from the Life-Saving Service until some man wants a place to go down to establish a station for himself and his friends. That is the upshot of this business. There is no justice or fairness in it.

The Senate can dispose of it as it pleases; at the same time I am here to protest against the sort of action which gives away the rights of an entire line of Gulf coast a thousand miles long while it provides everything that this committee wanted for themselves in the northern part of the country.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of one has arrived, but the conference report will receive the consideration of the Senate unless the Senate otherwise order.

Mr. HARRIS. It is a privileged question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be continued until the Senate order otherwise. The Chair simply announced that the hour of one had arrived. This is a privileged question. If the Senate choose to postpone the consideration of it they can; otherwise it is before the Senate.

Mr. CALL. I merely wish to say, in behalf of the people of my State and the commerce that passes around the Gulf, that I think this report ought not to be concurred in.

The statistics which have been published were very incomplete, but so far as they go they evidence the fact that a very large portion of the casualties have occurred on the coast of Florida. The records here contain accounts of five or six wrecks during the last year by stranding, collision, and foundering on the coast of Alabama and the coast of Florida. There are fourteen hundred miles of the coast of Florida, more than seven hundred miles being on the Gulf of Mexico. There is no question whatever that the commerce which passes around the coast of Florida is as great as that of any part of the United States, and there is no question that a life-saving service, a very fully equipped and complete service, ought to be on that coast. It interests the people of the West, of the Mississippi Valley, far more than it does the people of Florida. But there is no doubt of the fact that Congress is not doing its duty to that section of the country in not providing more adequate protection to life and property. The statistics, as I have stated, show the fact that there have been a large number of wrecks on and near the coast of Florida, and I repeat that Congress owes it to the commerce of the country to provide a more efficient Life-Saving Service than there is now.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, I desire to submit in this connection some statistics in regard to the number of vessels stranded on these different coasts, and some statements which will explain the action of the committee of conference. I desire to have them inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Michigan.

The papers submitted by Mr. CONGER are as follows:

THE LIFE-SAVING SERVICE NOT SECTIONAL.

1. The climate of the South is much milder and less productive of marine disaster than that of the North.

2. The amount of shipping exposed to the dangers of the Northern coasts vastly exceeds that of the Southern, the vast commerce of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore all passing along the former, not to mention such cities as Portland, Portsmouth, Newburyport, Gloucester, Providence, Newport, New London, New Haven, Wilmington, (Delaware,) and others. Against this is the commerce in the South of Wilmington, (North Carolina,) Charleston, Savannah, Fernandina, Jacksonville, Pensacola, Mobile, New Orleans, Galveston, and a few minor places. The shipping passing out of the Gulf of Mexico up through the straits of Florida, except such as is bound to local ports south of Cape Hatteras, gives the coast of Georgia, South Carolina, and a large portion of the coast of North Carolina a wide berth, the track lying far out to sea in order to clear Cape Hatteras.

3. The comparative dangers of the two sections are best illustrated by the following statement of the number of vessels which have stranded upon the Atlantic and Gulf coast from the year 1871 to 1880, both inclusive, as obtained from the statistics collected from the owners and masters of vessels suffering casualties on the coast of the United States, through the officers of the customs under the provisions of sections 10, 11, and 12 of the act of June 20, 1874:

Maine	315	Delaware	73
New Hampshire	25	Maryland	65
Massachusetts	529	Virginia	138
Connecticut	45	North Carolina	134
Rhode Island	102	South Carolina	27
New York	208	Georgia	19
New Jersey	247	Florida	88
		Alabama	5
Total	1,471	Louisiana	15
Excess in North	810	Total	661

But the Government has fully extended the protection of life-saving stations as far south as the Cape Fear River, near the southern line of North Carolina, having already in operation twenty-five stations between Cape Henry and Cape Fear. Inspection of the above table shows that south of North Carolina there have been but two hundred and fifty-one cases of strandings, while on the coast of New Jersey alone there have been two hundred and forty-seven, nearly an equal number, and on the coast of Massachusetts there have been more than twice as many.

The life-saving stations on the Atlantic coast are closed from May 1 to September 1, on account of the mildness of the season, and because the disasters during this period are comparatively infrequent and less calamitous. Yet in the last six years, the number of vessels which have stranded on the New Jersey coast alone, during this season when stations were closed, is thirty-eight, just twice as many as have stranded on the entire coast of Georgia during ten years.

The following table shows the number of disasters upon the Atlantic and Gulf coast by life-saving districts, and the distribution of life-saving stations as at present existing:

Number of vessels stranded from 1871 to 1880, (both inclusive.)

Districts.	States.	No. of vessels stranded.	Existing stations.
First	Maine 315, New Hampshire 25	340	7
Second	Massachusetts 529	529	15
Third	Rhode Island 102, New York 208	310	37
Fourth	New Jersey 247	247	40
Fifth	Delaware 73, Maryland 65, Virginia (part) 64	202	11
Sixth	Virginia (part) 74, North Carolina 134	208	24
Seventh	Florida 88	88	*5
Eighth	Alabama 5, Louisiana 15, Texas 97, Mississippi 4	121	5

* Houses of refuge.

4. The extension of the Life-Saving Service to any portion of the Southern coast was proposed and secured by the efforts of a Northern man, Hon. John Lynch of Maine, who introduced a bill authorizing the establishment of stations on the coasts of Virginia and North Carolina, which was approved March 3, 1873, and all stations established at the South since that time have been proposed by Northern men, with the exception of one, that at Sabine Pass, which was proposed by Hon. JOHN H. REAGAN.

5. In 1878, an act considerably extending the domain of the service was passed June 18. The bill was for a long time in the hands of the Committee on Commerce, of which a Southern man, Hon. JOHN H. REAGAN, was chairman, and of which the majority were of the party affiliating with the South. Many petitions from the South, such as that of the boards of trade at Galveston, New Orleans, and Mobile, the underwriters of those cities, and the owners and masters of vessels, were presented to the House and referred to that committee, asking for the passage of the bill as it was introduced, and never once intimating that there was a desire for more stations on the coast below North Carolina, nor did any one of the committee declare the need of such, with the exception of the one above referred to at Sabine Pass.

The main provisions of the bill are as follows:

The first section of the bill as it passed the House provided for the establishment of life-saving stations and houses of refuge at or near certain points named on the Atlantic, Gulf, and lake coasts. The Senate amended this section by providing for life-saving stations, as follows: one at or near Brenton's Point or Beaver Tail, Rhode Island; one at or near Fort Morgan, on the bay of Mobile; three on the Atlantic coast of Florida, one near Key West, one near Jupiter Inlet, one at or near Cape Canaveral; one on the gulf coast of Florida, west of Apalachicola River; one at or near Tybee Island, at the port of Savannah, Georgia; one near Brunswick; one near Doboy; one on or near Cumberland Island or Fernandina, near the line of Georgia and Florida; three on the coast of South Carolina, near the ports of Georgetown, Charleston, and Beaufort. The action of the committee recommends concurrence in these amendments so far as to provide for the establishment of stations as follows:

One at or near Brenton's Point or Beaver Tail, Rhode Island; two on the Atlantic coast of Florida, one near Key West and one near Jupiter Inlet; one on the Gulf coast of Florida, west of Apalachicola River; two on the coast of South Carolina, at or near the ports of Georgetown and Charleston. The statistics of disasters collected through the officers of the customs under the authority of sections 10, 11, and 12 of the act of June 20, 1864, from the owners and masters of vessels suffering disaster upon the coast of the United States, showing a sufficient number of marine casualties in the neighborhood of these places, taken in conjunction with the nature of the coasts and the amount of shipping exposed thereon, to appear to justify the establishment of the stations named. The action of the committee recommends non-concurrence in so much of these amendments as contemplate the establishment of stations at or near Fort Morgan, on the bay of Mobile; at or near Cape Canaveral; at or near Tybee Island; at or near Brunswick; at or near Doboy; at or near Cumberland Island or Fernandina, and at or near Beaufort, South Carolina—the reasons above given not appearing to the committee to exist in a sufficient degree at these localities to demand the present establishment of stations thereat.

The number of vessels which appear to have stranded during the last ten years at these points is as follows: at or near Fort Morgan, on Mobile Bay, 4; at or near Cape Canaveral, 1; at or near Tybee, 4; at or near Brunswick, 6; at or near Doboy, 4; at or near Cumberland Island or Fernandina, 4; at or near Beaufort, South Carolina, 2. There was no loss of life at any of these strandings, and it may be remarked here that strandings are the form of disaster which the Life-Saving Service is chiefly designed to meet.

The fourth section of the bill as it passed the House fixed the salaries of the district superintendents as follows: for the first, eighth, and twelfth districts, $1,800 per annum, respectively; for the second and fifth districts, $2,000 per annum, respectively; for the third, fourth, sixth, ninth, tenth, and eleventh districts, $2,500 per annum, respectively; for the seventh district, $1,000. The Senate amended this section by reducing these figures to $1,500 per annum for the superintendents of the first, second, fifth, and eighth districts, respectively, and to $1,800 per annum for the surperintendents of the third, fourth, sixth, ninth, tenth, and eleventh districts, respectively; and increased the compensation for the superintendent of the seventh district to $1,200 per annum.

The committee have recommended concurrence in these amendments, believing that while the reduced rates of compensation may not be adequate to the service rendered and the responsibilities of these officers, they are yet probably sufficient to secure competent men for the position, and that the service may not materially suffer on this account for some time to come. As to the increase from $1,000 to $1,200 per annum in the seventh district, it is believed to be justified by the increased number of stations and houses of refuge which the bill provides for the coast under the charge of the superintendent.

The Senate added an amendment to the fifth section of the bill as it passed the House, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to fix the pay of the men employed at the different stations in proportion to the services rendered, provided the same shall not exceed $50 per month. Under existing law (section 7, act June 18, 1878) the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service is authorized to fix the compensation of surfmen within the provisions of the appropriations, there being no rate or amount of compensation fixed by law. The committee have recommended concurrence in this amendment, with an amendment striking out the words "in proportion to the services rendered," thus leaving the rate of compensation to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury in his discretion, within the limit of $50 per month. The committee believe it better that the discretion of the Secretary should not be limited to the consideration of the amount of services rendered, which it would oftentimes be difficult to accurately determine, but that he should be at liberty also to consider the rates of wages current at different places and different times, and perhaps the value in skill and experience of the men. The committee have introduced a formal amendment to the section, providing for the appointment of the keepers of stations, in order to dispose of a possible question as to the authority for their appointment.

The Senate amended the bill as it passed the House by adding, after section 6, two other sections, (7 and 8,) the first providing for the continuance upon the rolls of the service with pay, for a limited period, of any keeper or member of a life-saving crew who may become disabled in the line of his duty; and the second continuing for two years the pay of any keeper or member of a life-saving crew who shall lose his life in the line of duty, to his widow or children under sixteen years of age. The committee have recommended concurrence in these amendments, believing that it is no more than just that some provision should be made for those who suffer from this extra hazardous service, and that it is better to provide for them in this way than by the establishment of a civil pension list. The committee believe that, in addition to the consideration of justice in the premises, the Government would be more than compensated for the expenditure involved in the measure by the increased efficiency which it will secure.

A typographical error in section 9, giving the word "token" as "taken," has been corrected.

Section 8 of the bill as it passed the House (now section 10) provided that the appointment of keepers and crews of life-saving stations should be made solely with reference to their fitness, and without reference to their political or party affiliations. The Senate amended this section by including in its provisions district superintendents and inspectors. The committee have recommended concurrence in this amendment, believing that the same reasons for excluding political considerations in the case of keepers and crews apply equally to superintendents and inspectors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in; there being, on a division—ayes 28, noes 13.

DR. A. SIDNEY TEBBS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will proceed to the consideration of the business on the Calendar under the Anthony rule. The Secretary will state the first bill in order.

The ACTING SECRETARY. The bill (S. No. 296) for the relief of Dr. A. Sidney Tebbs.

Mr. ALLISON. That bill, I understand, was taken out of the Anthony rule yesterday by a vote of the Senate, so that it has passed away from action under that rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is a new question.

Mr. GARLAND. If it comes under the Anthony rule, is it subject to five minutes' debate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair supposes that like any other case under the rule that is called it is called again to-day, having been undisposed of yesterday. It is now taken up under the Anthony rule, but the limitation as to debate is withdrawn.

Mr. ALLISON. But if it is taken up this morning under the Anthony rule, of course there is a debate of five minutes?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No. It is taken up in spite of the objection, and it continues under the Anthony rule, but without the limit of debate applying.

Mr. ALLISON. It is the unfinished business of yesterday, then?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In one sense it is. It is on the Calendar, and is the first case to be called on the Calendar to-day. The Senate have decided that they will hear it, notwithstanding the objection that was interposed, and therefore the limit of debate does not apply to it.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a practical ending of the Anthony rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a very important question, because if that construction prevails it is practically an ending of the Anthony rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But this comes under the Anthony rule now. The Anthony rule has been amended by adding:

> But if the Senate shall proceed with the consideration of any matter notwithstanding an objection, the foregoing provisions touching debate shall not apply, but the subject shall be proceeded with under the standing rules of the Senate.

If this bill had been considered under the five-minute rule yesterday it would come up this morning. This is simply carrying out the Anthony rule. It is in order until two o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was of opinion that the Chair was right in his construction of the Anthony rule, and would have so voted if that question had been pressed; but that has been changed, and now the rule expressly provides that when the Senate, during the execution of the order under the Anthony rule, interposes by a majority vote to take a bill out of the Anthony rule it shall then be conducted under the general standing rules of the Senate. I understand—and I only wish a correct construction of the rule, so that we shall avoid difficulty and delay hereafter—that upon a motion made by the Senator from Vermont, and upon an amendment adopted on his motion, when a bill is taken off the Calendar under the Anthony rule by a vote of a majority of the Senate, it is then to be conducted as if that rule did not exist and the bill was taken up like any other bill, to be debated and decided under the standing rules of the Senate. The last words of the amendment place it under the standing rules of the Senate. This is a temporary rule, applying only to this session.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question? The Senate having decided to take up this bill within the morning hour, notwithstanding the Anthony rule, and having proceeded with it up to two o'clock yesterday without having concluded it, does that prevent it from coming up as still the first thing in order under the Anthony rule? If so, the vote to take it up is more fatal to it than an objection. I think it still remains over and comes up as unfinished business under the Anthony rule in the morning hour.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me, this amendment made by the Senator from Vermont takes it out from the force of the Anthony rule and leaves it under the general rules of the Senate, and when the two hours shall have expired it goes on as the unfinished business.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not at all.

Mr. FERRY. Because it is under the control of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is the unfinished business under the Anthony rule, but cannot be the unfinished business of the day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to complete what I have to say.

Mr. GARLAND. I rise to a question of order. What is the question that is being debated?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question whether the Tebbs bill is now in order.

Mr. GARLAND. That question has been decided by the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hear the suggestions of Senators before finally deciding.

Mr. GARLAND. Does the Chair decide it or submit it to the Senate? It is not debatable until the Chair does something of that sort. I want to get rid of the matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not care how it is submitted; the Chair asked the opinion of the Senate.

Mr. GARLAND. Does the Senator from Ohio appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Chair can always take the opinion of the Senate on any question of order that arises.

Mr. GARLAND. I do not understand that the Chair has submitted any question of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understood the Chair to invite suggestions on the subject.

Mr. GARLAND. He cannot invite suggestions except by submitting questions under the rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to waste time.

Mr. GARLAND. We went over this ground yesterday. If there was a new question now I would not interpose.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is always usual to hear a Senator on such a point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hear the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not desire to delay; it is not my habit to delay business by a discussion of these matters; but I want to get this rule settled, so that we may go on without dispute. It does seem to me that when the Senate yesterday set aside the Anthony rule this bill was brought before the Senate under the standing rules of the Senate. Now let me read the words; they are as plain as they can be written:

But the subject shall be proceeded with under the standing rules of the Senate.

What are "the standing rules of the Senate?" They are that debate shall be unlimited, that things shall go on without limit of time as to discussion. They are exactly the opposite of the Anthony rule. Therefore, the very moment a majority of this body decide that a bill shall be considered without regard to limitation of debate, it must be conducted under the standing rules of the Senate. What can be plainer than that?

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if he thinks that this bill has lost its place on the Calendar?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all.

Mr. HARRIS. Has it lost its place by reason of the objection and the fact that the Senate overruled the objection by ordering that the Senate should proceed with the consideration of the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, what I mean is this: that when an objection is made to a bill it has lost its benefit of consideration under the Anthony rule; that objection is sufficient to prevent its being considered under the Anthony rule. Then the Senate under the express amendment made yesterday may proceed to consider it under the standing rules of the Senate, not under the Anthony rule. Nothing can be plainer than that, it seems to me.

I do not want to delay the consideration of this bill; indeed I want to go on with it, but I say that when the Senate does take a bill out from under the Anthony rule it cannot be claimed that the Anthony rule keeps it on the Calendar in the way of all other business of the Senate; otherwise the Anthony rule might just as well be laid on the table.

Mr. FERRY. And I might add to what the Senator from Ohio has said that when the two hours expire there is no force to the Anthony rule. Therefore, under the order of the Senate, by the amendment adopted yesterday, a bill is taken out of the Anthony rule and considered under the general rules of the Senate; and what are those rules? That it shall continue until disposed of by the Senate, and if it passes the hour of two o'clock the force of the Anthony rule loses its power.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then at the hour of two o'clock it is the unfinished business?

Mr. FERRY. It goes on and continues; but when the Senate adjourns, if it has not been disposed of, it is the unfinished business to be taken up the next day. What force is there in the amendment unless it is to take such a bill out of the Anthony rule? The very point of the amendment is to prevent one Senator from dictating the legislation of this body. Otherwise a single objection here, as stated by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] followed up successively, would clear the Calendar without any consideration whatever. Now, the object of this amendment is to take out an objected bill and leave it to the majority of the body and they decide that it shall be controlled by the general rules of the Senate. It seems to me it is a clear case. There cannot be any question of it.

Mr. HOAR. I wish I could agree with my honorable friends on my right, for I should like very much to have their view of the case apply at present, but it seems to me that this rule is very clear and that the opinion indicated by the Chair is clearly correct.

In the first place the Anthony rule provides for considering bills in their order upon the Calendar. That is the first thing. Then comes the provision of the Anthony rule that bills not objected to shall be considered under a five-minute debate, and that no Senator can speak but once, and that if there be an objection the bill shall go over to the foot of the Calendar, still retaining its place on the Calendar, but going to the bottom, below the unobjected bills. Then—the foregoing provisions touching debate shall not apply.

But if the Senate shall proceed with the consideration of any matter notwithstanding an objection—

The bill shall then be taken out of the Anthony rule; but—

That is all. Every other provision of the Anthony rule remains.

But the subject shall be proceeded with under the standing rules of the Senate.

All that is a rule to govern the Senate for the time up to two o'clock.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. FERRY. Would not the Senate have the power within the two hours to order the consideration of, say, the Chinese bill, or any other bill?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. FERRY. If that be the case, would not the general rules apply to the bill before the Senate; and if so, then if the two hours expire would it not continue? Is that order of the Senate confined to the two hours under the Anthony rule?

Mr. HOAR. All the rules of the Senate, the Anthony rule as well as the general standing rules, leave it in the power of the Senate at any time to lay aside any pending matter and take up any other. The proceeding with the Calendar up to two o'clock is only in case the Senate do not otherwise order. The Senate may at any time otherwise order. This proposition makes the proceeding with this bill a proceeding under the Anthony rule up to two o'clock. The Anthony rule is still in force to give it this priority up to two o'clock and then stops; but—

The foregoing provisions touching debate—

Are the only ones that do not apply, and in lieu of which the standing rules of the Senate, that is the standing rules as to debate, not the standing rules as to the order of business, shall apply. In other words, when a bill is objected to under the Anthony rule it goes to the foot of the docket below the unobjected cases, unless the Senate by a majority vote, still acting under the Anthony rule, takes it up, and when by a majority vote it is taken up under the Anthony rule then it is taken up without the application of the foregoing provisions as to debate, but in that respect substituting the standing rules of the Senate, but in every other particular leaving the Anthony rule in operation.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Chair state the pending question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not any pending question. The point was made by the Senator from Ohio that the Senate could not proceed with this bill now, that it could not be taken up, that some other must be taken up, that it had lost its place.

Mr. HOAR. Did not the Chair rule on that point?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did rule, but the Chair suggested that he would hear any Senator speak and then decide the point. The Chair is of the opinion that under the Anthony rule this bill is to be considered now, and by the amendment yesterday it remains under the Anthony rule still. As to bills that are objected to, where a majority of the Senate decide that notwithstanding the objection they shall be heard, then the limitation of debate is the only thing that gives that case a preference over any other. That was the object. It is to be considered until two o'clock. If it was anything else, then it meant that a bill so taken up should override any other case, and override the unfinished business. The Chair does not believe that that was the intention of the Senate in passing the amendment yesterday. The mischief at which it was aimed was, as the Chair understood the decision that was made by the Chair, that it was still under the Anthony rule, and must be considered with five minutes' debate. By the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, and the Senator from Massachusetts, both being substantially the same, the limit as to debate was withdrawn; but the bill still continues under the Anthony rule till two o'clock, and is open to unlimited debate.

Mr. FERRY. May I ask a question of the Chair? Then by the ruling of the Chair, the Senator from Vermont, as well as myself, is incorrect that the Senate cannot order the taking up of any question that is not on the Calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate can by a majority vote decide to take up anything.

Mr. FERRY. Then I would ask the Chair, if that be the case, in the illustration which I suggested to the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. FERRY. I think I have the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. Has the Chair ruled upon the question of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has.

Mr. HARRIS. Has there been an appeal from that decision?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I call the Senator from Michigan to order.

Mr. FERRY. I hardly think the Senator from Tennessee will make that point when I am asking the Chair a question, pending this matter, so that we may understand it and not blunder again.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator is only asking a question, I shall not object.

Mr. FERRY. I thought the Senator would not. I was asking the Chair whether it would be in order for any Senator to move during the two hours, or when the Anthony rule is in force, to take up any other question that is not on the Calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will not answer any such question as that.

Mr. INGALLS. The Chair is not here for the purpose of answering conundrums, but to enforce the rules of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair decides that this case is within the Anthony rule, and is to be considered without limitation of debate.

Mr. HARRIS. What is the question on the bill pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the motion to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McPHERSON. Do I understand the Chair to rule that it is without limitation of debate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir. The pending question is the motion of the Senator from Vermont to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have intended when this subject was brought before the Senate to vote for the repeal of section 1218 of the Revised Statutes, which excludes from serving in the Army in any capacity persons who were engaged during the civil war in the rebel service, and also to vote to repeal all provisions of law in regard to test-oaths, and to be liberal also in the construction of the third clause of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution. I wish it distinctly understood that while at the proper time and with proper modifications I will so vote, I do it upon the firm conviction that these laws when passed were all wise laws, exceedingly liberal, as the basis of concessions and a settlement with defeated insurgents at the close of a great civil war, unexampled in all history for liberality and generosity by the victorious party. The test-oath was adopted in the midst of the war, the act being passed in July, 1862, just when the war was most threatening and imminent. It was intended to guard these Chambers, the House and the Senate, from the admission of persons who would take the oath of office and then violate it. One conspicuous example had occurred in the previous session of Congress; it was then full upon the public mind. A man distinguished in position in one of the States of the Union had taken the oath of office July 4, 1861, and within a month afterward was engaged in armed rebellion against the United States. Therefore that law was undoubtedly properly passed and justified by the circumstances of the case. Afterward it was modified by the act of 1868, so that those who were relieved from disabilities might take a modified oath and come here and participate in legislation.

I do not see any occasion for keeping that law upon the statute-book. It has served its purpose. Perhaps there might be some exceptions properly made in the repeal of that law. If so the Committee on the Judiciary ought to carefully consider them and provide for them, but it seems to me it is incongruous to require persons who are loyal and have always been true to their country to take a long involved oath relating to circumstances that have ceased to exist for seventeen years, and to administer a modified oath in substantially the old original form to those who have participated in the rebellion. If there are any supposed exceptions to be made to this general repeal they should be pointed out by the Judiciary Committee.

So also with the law which was passed just at the close of the war, declaring that no person who had participated in the rebellion should serve in the Army of the United States. That certainly was a proper provision of law at the time it was made. It was passed at the close of the war, when there were discharged from the Army more than one million of men then enrolled in the Union Army, at a time when our armies were being disbanded, and when many soldiers who had served faithfully in the Army were suddenly deprived of their employment and consigned to private life. Then it was declared in this section 1218 that no person who had participated in the rebellion in any form, either in the civil, military, or naval service, should be appointed in the Army. Now seventeen years have rolled around. The young men who entered the rebel service have now reached, say, forty years of age. Very few who were then officers of the Army are now eligible or fitted for active service. No one can now be appointed an officer of the Army except at the foot of it as a second lieutenant, except for certain quasi-civil offices, such as paymasters, surgeons, and the like, few and limited in number. Even now it may be proper and right that some exceptions should be made. When a repeal is had there may be some striking exceptions of classes or cases. Take the class referred to by the Senator from South Carolina. Persons who graduated at West Point or Annapolis and were educated to perform military or naval services should not be permitted under any circumstances to go into the Army. It may be proper to make exceptions of that kind, but the general provisions of the law have no application to this time. It would be a rare case under peculiar circumstances that would induce a President of the United States to appoint to the Army any one who had been prominent in the rebel service.

Mr. MAXEY. I will state to the Senator from Ohio, if he will permit me, although personally I care nothing about it, (I am not applying to get any one in the Army, and I do not want to get any one into it,) you may take the youngest men who were at West Point and they would not be eligible to appointment, by reason of age. I have in mind one who lives now in my town, and who left the Academy when he was about seventeen years old, and became a brigadier-general in the service. He is thirty-seven or thirty-eight years old now. An Army regulation, which has the force and operation of law, controls matters of that kind. A lieutenant cannot be appointed at thirty-eight years of age. Therefore it would be a vain and useless thing to legislate against a class of men who could not receive such an appointment. Again I want to call the attention of the Senator for a moment——

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is making a speech, and I do not want to prolong the debate.

Mr. MAXEY. The people may elect as President of the United States a man who was once a rebel if they see proper to do so, if he is now under the flag of the country doing his duty, and he is by operation of law commander-in-chief of the Army; and yet a boy who helped him, who waited on him while he was a rebel, could not be made a corporal. That is simply an absurdity. The whole thing is extremely ridiculous.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Texas has been able to state much more clearly than I——

Mr. MAXEY. Not at all. I was only in the line of the Senator's argument. I hope the Senator understands me. I agree with the argument he is making. The exception he referred to I think would not be proper or necessary.

Mr. SHERMAN. The law is not congruous, I may say, to the present condition of affairs, but at the same time there may be properly exceptions, or classes of exceptions made even in the repeal of the law.

In regard to the constitutional amendment, the third clause of the fourteenth article, I have never known a case where any person who was subject to the disabilities imposed by that amendment has applied for the removal of those disabilities that it has not been promptly and heartily granted. I believe now it is the standing practice that whenever any one applies for the removal of his disabilities it is at once granted as a matter of course.

The provisions of the reconstruction acts were temporary in their nature; they only applied to the first election or for a short period of years, and they have disappeared; so that all that is left of the provisions growing out of the war affecting any persons who had been engaged in the rebel service are contained in the three enactments to which I have alluded, most of which have spent their force.

When I shall vote from time to time, as I will, for properly framed bills to remove these disabilities I want to impress upon the Senate, and if I can upon Senators from the Southern States who fall within the description contained in those bills, that these laws were wise in themselves, liberal, just, generous, more so than you can find in the records of any civil war in times passed. While we remove these disabilities now, we do not repeal laws unjust when made, but laws that were wise when made, but which have ceased to be operative upon facts as they now exist.

I think that all parties in this country ought to feel and confess that at the close of the war the loyal people of the United States who remained true to the flag were generous and liberal and manly. No man after the war was punished for any act done as a rebel during the war. No fine or disability was imposed after the war was over. No blood was shed. Where else can that be said in any previous history? No property was confiscated; no disability was imposed except one that could be easily removed by an act of Congress. The third clause of the fourteenth amendment only imposed a temporary disability, which was merely a straw to be removed whenever a man who participated in the rebellion would simply say, "please remove these disabilities from me." So this law which was passed at the close of the war when a million of men were disbanded, simply prevents those who served in the rebel army from filling a place in the Army until Congress should repeal the law.

Therefore, I trust (and this is the point of my speech) that the Senator from Arkansas will not press this bill, but will allow it to go to the Committee on the Judiciary or to the Committee on Military Affairs, whichever is the proper one; and let such committee fairly consider it and report such qualifications or limitations as may be deemed proper.

I desire to see this bill passed by the votes of both sides of the Chamber, by Republicans as well as by Democrats. I do not desire to see it passed by the votes of those who are described in the language of these sections. Let it be referred to the Judiciary Committee, and let it be reported, and I trust that it will meet the hearty concurrence of both sides of the House.

It is said that the Judiciary Committee have had these bills pending before it, and have not reported, but we have now the assurance made yesterday by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] that they will consider this subject and report bills without any unnecessary delay. We may possibly have in a single bill all the provisions that are necessary to relieve all disabilities arising out of the war, with proper reservations and exceptions.

As I said in rising, whenever this question comes up, although I voted for all these sections, supported them honestly, believed them right, and believe them right now, but inapplicable to our time, I shall now vote for their repeal, but I would rather the whole subject shall be presented in a single bill that would enable us on both sides without any division of party to vote for a general relief from disabilities growing out of the war.

Mr. MAXEY. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio, and he is fair on this question, why should the Judiciary Committee more than the Military Committee pass upon the qualifications of a person to go into the Army? What reason is there for it? The Military Committee is the proper committee to consider the bill and that committee has reported. It relates exclusively to appointments in the Army, a matter with which the Judiciary Committee has nothing to do whatever.

Mr. SHERMAN. The subject-matter of the removal of political disabilities is rather in the nature of a legal question, and the test-oath question is, I understand, before the Judiciary Committee and is pending there in the form of three or four different bills. To me it is a matter of perfect indifference whether it goes to the Military Committee or to the Judiciary Committee. I think, however, it had better go to the Judiciary Committee, because the laws to be repealed in regard to the test-oath are three or four in number, and they would have to be modified, the bill would have to be carefully framed to meet that question, and in doing that the committee might as well take into consideration the repeal of section 1218, which is only a brief section of two or three lines.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I hope this bill will not be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and for these reasons: as I stated yesterday, a bill precisely similar to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas which we are now considering has been introduced by me three several times and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, first in December, 1878, again the 21st of March, 1879, and again on the 5th day of April, 1881, and at no time has it ever been reported to the Senate. Why should we send them yet another? No amount of investigation can make the simple question before us clearer than it has been made by the statements of Senators on both sides.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] said truly that no young man who was in the confederate service and was over eighteen, or certainly over twenty years of age, at the time the war closed can by possibility ask for anything to which this section relates, or be appointed by the President to any place in the Army. Senators all know that section 1218 does not reach any class of men who are fairly objectionable to any of the laws that were passed in order to punish men for taking part in the war. Take for example the case of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE,] who yesterday voted against considering this bill. It would seem to me impossible for him to vote against it when the question of its repeal is before the Senate. I do not see him in his seat; I use his position only to illustrate my view. How could a man occupying the relation he does oppose it? He was a general in the confederate army and is now occupying a position in this body. He can be President, he can occupy any political position, but the boy twelve or fourteen years of age who was employed by the State of Virginia or by the Confederate States to hold his horse, carry his orders, or wait upon him while he was a brigadier-general in the confederate army, cannot even apply for a place in the Army of the United States.

The idea that a Senator so situated would vote to retain this law in the statute-book is too absurd for men to discuss. When all the heads of the confederate government and its armies, all the so-called offenders, are free, why should young men who had nothing to do with the war except to work in humble places in order to make a living, indeed being about the only class who were compelled so to work, be excluded from applying for a place in the Army of the United States?

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said this question ought to be considered along with the test-oath. I see neither necessary nor proper connection between them. I desire to say, however, that the action of the Judiciary Committee in regard to the test-oath makes it still more important that the Senate should not send any more of these political questions to that committee. I have introduced bills ever since I have been here, and referred them to that committee, to repeal the test-oath. I have read briefs, not very able ones I presume, certainly not very convincing, but very strongly fortified, to show that it ought to be done. I am glad that the Senator from Ohio says it ought to be done; yet no report could be had from that distinguished committee.

As early as February 15, 1871, General Grant, then President of the United States, sent the following special message to the Senate and House of Representatives:

> I have this day transmitted to the Senate the announcement that Senate bill No. 218, "An act prescribing an oath of office to be taken by persons who participated in the late rebellion, but who are not disqualified from holding office by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States," has become a law in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, without the signature of the President.
> If this were a bill for the repeal of the test-oath required of persons "elected or appointed to offices of honor or trust," it would meet my approval. The effect of the law, however, is to relieve from taking a prescribed oath all those persons whom it was intended to exclude from such offices and to require it from all others. By this law the soldier who fought and bled for his country is to swear to his loyalty before assuming official functions, while the general who commanded hosts for the overthrow of his Government is admitted to place without it. I cannot affix my name to a law which discriminated against the upholder of his Government.
> I believe, however, that it is not wise policy to keep from office, by an oath, those who are not disqualified by the Constitution and who are the choice of legal voters. But while relieving them from an oath which they cannot take, I recommend the release also of those to whom the oath has no application.
> U. S. GRANT.

Yet eleven years after that urgent message was sent, the Committee on the Judiciary refuse to consider or to report bills looking to its repeal or to give the Senate a chance to vote upon it. Why should we again refer these matters to them?

Again, sir, when the old soldiers of the war of 1812 were for a time prevented from obtaining their pensions, because they could not take the oath, the President of the United States in his sixth annual message, December 7, 1874, General Grant being then President, used this language:

> The act of Congress providing the oath which pensioners must subscribe to before drawing their pensions cuts off from this bounty a few survivors of the war of 1812 residing in the Southern States. I recommend the restoration of this bounty to all such. The number of persons whose names would thus be restored to the list of pensioners is not large. They are all old persons, who could have taken no part in the rebellion, and the services for which they were awarded pensions were in defense of the whole country.

Then again he proceeds to comment on the folly of all this class of legislation being continued. The Committee on the Judiciary have another bill before them—it was intimated yesterday that I have been bringing in bills seeking to wipe out all this class of laws. I agree that I have before that committee a bill to remove the political disabilities of all men. That bill was also recommended by General Grant, President of the United States, as early as 1873, in these words:

> I renew my previous recommendation to Congress for general amnesty. The number engaged in the late rebellion yet laboring under disabilities is very small, but enough to keep up a constant irritation. No possible danger can accrue to the Government by restoring them to eligibility to hold office.

On the 8th day of December, 1873, in the House of Representatives, (then Republican by a very large majority,) Mr. Maynard, a Representative from Tennessee, introduced a bill "granting general amnesty, with removal of all political disabilities," repealing the iron-clad oath and prescribing another. I will read the bill. It is as follows:

> Be it enacted, &c., That all disabilities imposed and remaining upon any person by virtue of section 3 of article 14 of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States be, and the same are hereby, removed.
> SEC. 2. That the act of July 2, 1862, entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," be, and it is hereby, repealed. And hereafter every person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit under the Government of the United States, either in the civil, military, or naval departments of the public service, shall, before entering upon the duties of such office, and being entitled to any of the salary or other emoluments thereof, take and subscribe the oath prescribed by the act of July 11, 1868, entitled "An act prescribing an oath of office to be taken by persons from whom legal disabilities shall have been removed."

That bill passed the House of Representatives on the 8th day of December, 1873, as is shown by the attestation of Edward McPherson, Clerk, and by the RECORD of December 8, 1873, page 91, by a vote of 141 yeas to 29 nays, and it was passed after discussion. When Mr. Maynard read the bill, Mr. Lawrence put this question:

> Would not that admit Jeff. Davis to a seat on this floor?
> Several MEMBERS. Certainly.
> Mr. LAWRENCE. Then I object to it.
> Mr. G. F. HOAR. I will inquire of the Speaker whether, under the rule applied by him in the last Congress to the Committee on Printing, the Committee on Rules are authorized to report general legislation at any time?

The Chair answered that question.

Mr. HOAR then said:

> I desire simply to have the point of order decided, and then I will waive objection to the consideration of the bill; but I make the point of order.
> Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I must insist on the point of order.
> The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. Maynard then moved to suspend the rules and pass the bill. He then said:

> And in answer to the question propounded by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] I tell him frankly that this bill will, if enacted, admit the president of the southern confederacy just as the vice-president has been already admitted, to a seat in either House of Congress, provided the people where he lives shall think proper to send him here. It is general amnesty as recommended by the President; and it also repeals what is called the test-oath, substituting for it the modified oath that we have all heard so often.
> Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not object to the bill if it has been considered and reported by a committee.
> Mr. MAYNARD. It is reported by the Committee on Rules unanimously.
> Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. All right.
> The SPEAKER. The bill would require a two-third vote to pass it.
> Mr. MAYNARD. I move that the rules be suspended and the bill passed.
> Mr. COX. Is there any objection to passing it unanimously? The President recommends amnesty; and let us unanimously wind up this foolish business of taking the test-oath.
> The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] objects, and that is sufficient.
> The question was taken on Mr. MAYNARD's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 141, noes 29.
> So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill—

House bill No. 472, which I have just read—was passed.

When the President of the United States recommended it nine years ago; when a Republican House of Representatives, after full explanation, I may say almost unanimously passed it; when the test-oath has been declared by the President of the United States over and over again to be an unnecessary and odious thing, why should we now refer such questions to committees? Why should not the Committee on the Judiciary give the Senate a chance to act upon these measures which have been so long and often before them? I have been here now nearly five years, I believe, and at the beginning of each Congress I have introduced bills to repeal these discriminating laws. All I want is a hearing. Of course when this bill comes before us, which is one of the series, proposing to strike down one of the distinctions that are still kept up, so that young men cannot apply for positions in the Army, I object to sending it back to the Judiciary Committee. That committee is the tomb of the Capulets for all such bills. The Senate can take a vote as well without the action of that or any other committee as with it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] complains so much of the Judiciary Committee that perhaps before the Senate pronounces sentence for its delinquencies, like other culprits brought to the bar for condemnation, it may be heard to say anything why the sentence of the law should not be pronounced against it. I have been a member of the Committee on the Judiciary ever since we have had the pleasure, and it is a pleasure, to see the Senator from Kentucky in this Hall rather than in another one which he graced so much. There has never been a time in all that period when, so far as my voice and vote would go, I have not been ready and willing, and more than willing, to report upon all of this general question and every aspect of it, as I am now.

We had a Democratic Committee on the Judiciary two years ago—strong, eminent, able. Its members of the majority comprised the very best talent of this body, its highest courage, its greatest statesmanship. When the Senator from Kentucky, I remember, a day or two before the change in the political aspect of this body in 1879, dismissed the Judiciary Committee, of which I was then chairman, with the expression that they would now have a Judiciary Committee (I do not quote it verbally but the idea) that would report such good measures as he was for and had introduced, I really felt considerable hope that the leading, primary object of the ambition of my friend from Kentucky for the time being would be accomplished, and that this Democratic committee, which was to hold, with the Senate here, potent sway for two years, making more than seven hundred days, which is a long time in one's life, would find a convenient way to present to this body and to the House of Representatives and to the President of the United States exactly what ground they were willing to occupy upon the eight or ten different points to which these questions apply. As a member in the minority of that committee I waited with patience, sometimes with a suggestive patience that they had better report upon the subject and put into definite form exactly what the Democratic party, whatever that may mean, wanted to do. Yet we never got anywhere, because I think, (and now I am expressing opinions and not stating history,) those wise Democratic members of the Committee on the Judiciary saw that it would not do to follow the logic of the bills of my friend from Kentucky; and what is the Democratic party, Mr. President, unless it is logical? What else has it to stand upon but logic? They saw that if they followed the logic of those bills it would be necessary to say, "now that the war is over and we are all equals and brothers, if the property of Mr. Jefferson Davis, (I have nothing against Mr. Davis personally; I have no reason to doubt that he did not follow his convictions, I am only speaking of him as a type) was destroyed in the course of war, as the property of a loyal citizen was, now that it is over he ought to be paid for it. I have heard that doctrine stated from Democratic lips in this body, and it is the logic of the idea of my friend from Kentucky. So, for more than seven hundred long days these Democratic statesmen, dominating the Judiciary Committee of this body, did not find it convenient to take one of these logical steps, because they did not exactly see where they were going safely to land.

That is the trouble about it. It is the trouble about the whole of this thing that if my friend from Kentucky is right in the principles that he has stated, (I know nothing about this individual case, and of course it is of no practical importance great or small,) if the logic of my friend from Kentucky is correct, then have we not the courage to follow it, and to say that there was no difference in any sense between the right and wrong of that unhappy controversy which we all wish to forget, and now that it is over, no matter on what side a citizen of the United States stood, whatever he suffered in consequence of his acts should be made good to him? There is the trouble, and it is a trouble that men have seen who had the control of the Senate and whose political wishes and sympathies were those of my friend from Kentucky. They did not find it convenient, I repeat, to report any scheme about this business, because they saw to what it would lead.

As the Senator from Ohio has said, and I do not know but that I said it yesterday—I had not thought of the subject yesterday, it sprang up without my knowing it—it might lead to the implication that I should be unwilling in any case to admit to the defense of the country in the Army of the United States a gentleman who had been engaged in the rebellion. If anything that I said yesterday implies that, I wish to retract it, because in the case of a foreign war, and it may be in many other wars, it might be highly expedient that any obstacles which now stand in the way of our brethren on the other side of this Chamber and the people who live in their section of the country from joining with our sons on perfectly equal terms in defending our common country ought to be removed, and I am very glad and willing when I can have an opportunity to consider how it can be done in consonance with principle and with good will. That is what I wish to do.

Now it is proposed to make a sweeping repeal of this section without regard to the other considerations which are involved and without regard to exceptions and classifications that for the honor of the country (because the country did win, and when I say the honor of the country I do not mean the dishonor of anybody else, do not misunderstand it) it is necessary should be in some way maintained. Is it not right to consider it?

All these questions of law of almost every form are before the Judiciary Committee now. That they have not been acted upon and reported, I will say, so far as I can remember, and I think I can remember, cannot be laid at the door of the individual who happens now to be chairman of that committee. I do not think it can be laid at the door of the Republican members of the committee generally; but the intrinsic difficulties of principle and of consequence in the logic that I have been speaking of are not easy to overcome; and so the matter has not been disposed of but is held under consideration.

I think my friends on the other side say that as it regards claims for injuries, they do not propose to put forward this oblivion, and put in the attitude of a claimant upon the Treasury of the United States any of the people who engaged in the rebellion for losses that they suffered in consequence of it, although the Army of the United States, and not the army of the so-called confederacy, committed that injury.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of two o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator from Vermont will be permitted to close his remarks.

Mr. HAWLEY and others. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent the Senator from Vermont will proceed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will not trespass upon the patience of the Senate. I only wish to persuade my brethren on the other side that this is not a question of feeling, of excitement, with us; but it is a question that, when they consider it themselves, they will find is not easily to be dealt with in a moment and to go off with the suddenness of the inspiration of a discussion of this kind. It requires to be put in an attitude that shall be just to the Government of the United States, that shall recognize the fact that the Government of the United States was in point of public law and of public justice, as men consider it, because the last alternative of trial was resorted to, on the upright side of this contest, and that consistently with that, as we have said over and over again and done over and over again, there is not in any Republican's mind in the State of Vermont, which I represent in part, or that I know of anywhere else, either resentment or dislike, but the reverse of it; and the only thing which astonishes us is these, I should not say persistent but spasmodic, efforts of gentlemen like my friend from Kentucky to force upon us these old questions again by undertaking to wipe out from the statute-books not merely some of those things which may conveniently and justly be erased, but the whole body of those enactments which must stand, unless you overturn everything, as the consequences of war having taken place.

I will not take up your time now, sir, by further discussion about this matter.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5804) to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese, the pending question being on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole striking out the fifteenth section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, when I took the floor upon this bill yesterday I had no expectation of occupying more than five or ten minutes at the outside, and I do not mean to prolong the debate now. I merely wish to state the facts to the Senate in reference to the treaty under which this bill is framed, which I think ought to have a very important bearing upon the question of the adoption of the pending amendment.

I remarked, when I before addressed the Senate on this bill, that the difficulty that we were in had mainly resulted from the fact that there was no definition in the act of 1862 of the word "coolies;" that that was a term which had been borrowed from India and came with an oriental signification; that it had no American signification properly so called; that there was actually no definition of the meaning of that word in the statute anywhere, although it was a highly penal law. A judge to execute it must go to India or to China to ascertain what the meaning of the term was there. He could not go to any treaty for that purpose, for this legislation commenced before the Burlingame treaty, and I believe before any reference was made in any treaty with China to the importation of coolies. The statute is therefore defective, and I suppose that accounts for the fact that no prosecutions have been had under it. If the same signification had been given to the word "coolies" in the Burlingame treaty or in the statute which we enacted for the purpose of preventing the immigration of that class of population which is now sought to be given by this amendment to the bill, we probably should have had a very different type of society from that which we have received from China, and there probably would have been some indictments and some convictions for a violation of the criminal laws of this country in their importation.

I maintain when we are enacting a penal law of the character which is couched in this bill, a law for the guidance of judgment, for the guidance of men who control ships, for the guidance of the importers of human labor, we owe it to ourselves and to our own people, first, that the law should have such difinition, such clearness of statement of the nature and the character of the offense as that no one can be well left in doubt about its meaning. Further than that, it is due to the Government of China, which has a duty to perform in preventing the emigration of this class of its people to the United States, that we should inform that government what we mean by the term "laborers" in this enactment.

If we give to the word "laborers" the same definition that was given to it by the negotiators of this treaty we shall not disappoint China and we shall not inflict upon that country any injury whatsoever. The commissioners who reported this treaty in the execution of which we are now proceeding, Mr. Angell, Mr. Swift, and Mr. Trescot, made a report, after the treaty had been signed with China, to the Secretary of State, on the 17th of November, 1880, in which the following statement appears:

> Without going into a detailed history of the negotiations which has been furnished to the Department from time to time in our former dispatches, we may say that the Chinese submitted a scheme which provided:
> First. That the immigration should be "regulated" by the Government of the United States, such regulations, however, to be communicated to the Chinese Government for approval before going into effect.
> Second. That "artisans" should not be included among Chinese laborers.
> Third. That the regulation should apply only to Chinese laborers in the employ of American citizens.
> Fourth. That if the regulation should extend to the limitation or suspension of such immigration, the limitation in point of numbers or the suspension in point of time should be specific.
> As to the second and third points of this scheme it is unnecessary to repeat the obvious reasons why they could not even be taken into consideration.

The second is that artisans should not be included among Chinese laborers. Our commissioners said it was unnecessary even to state the reason why that subject could not be taken into consideration. Proceeding further in their report to the Secretary of State, they say:

> At this point in the discussion we deemed it best to say that while the details of the treaty and its language were matters in which we would gladly consult the preferences of the Chinese Government, we could not consent to any settlement which did not recognize the entire discretion of the United States in dealing with this subject.

That was a very important statement which was made to the Chinese Government. They could not consent to any settlement which did not recognize the entire discretion of the United States in dealing with this subject. Further:

> We thought that any regulations to be matter of joint arrangement would only raise new questions, and that the administration of any such joint regulations would in practice prove unsatisfactory. Besides which they could only be of force in Chinese ports and would be useless in regard either to Hong-Kong or Singapore. We thought that the simplest, the directest, and the only efficient plan was to give the control of the subject to the Government of the United States.
> We therefore communicated to the Chinese commissioners that we would consent to strike out the word "prohibit," provided they would accept the words "regulate, limit, or suspend," being satisfied that these words covered the power to devise and enforce all necessary and proper legislation.

There was a distinct statement on the part of our commissioners to the Chinese Government that they would not accept the Chinese proposition that the word "laborers" should not include artisans, and thereupon that word was put into the treaty with the understanding that the word "laborers" did include "artisans," under the power and discretion of the United States Government to exclude them by statute.

That being the understanding of the definition of the word "laborers" in the treaty, and it being explained in the very communication with which our commissioners laid the treaty before our own Government for ratification, how can it be said that there is no necessity or no propriety in our placing that construction distinctly in the body of this bill? It seems to me that it is a clear duty that we should do so, a duty which we owe to China as well as a duty which we owe to all persons who may be concerned in this country or elsewhere in the effort to bring in such a class of immigration to this country.

Mr. President, I will not undertake to criticise the motives which may lie at the bottom of the objection to this definition of the word in the treaty, but I cannot close my eyes to the fact, as it seems to me, that there is a settled purpose that there shall be still longer doubt left in the construction of our statutes, so that they may be still further evaded. It was the doubt left in reference to the importation of coolies contained in the very fact that there was no definition of the meaning of the word "coolies" that has led to the great evasion which has caused swarms of people to come from China to this country without any construction of our statutes at all; and if we pass a statute of this kind without a construction which does not now define the class of people who may come and those who are excluded, we shall have still further evasion, and the law will become, as the cooly statute has become, a dead letter on the statute-book.

I desire that the bill shall be enacted in such a form as that it will have some efficiency, as that it will at least secure what the people of the United States desire, and have expressed twice by solemn vote given in both branches of Congress. To leave the word "laborers" to be construed by the terms of the treaty is merely to open the statute unnecessarily and unwisely to a construction some courts may put upon it adverse to the views entertained by the friends of this bill, and which they desire to exclude by express provision in the language of the bill itself.

Whatever else we do in the enactment of penal statutes, we should be definite and allow no equivocation; and in a matter of this kind where we see there is so much desire to evade the force of the law we certainly ought to be very careful to so define our meaning as that there shall be little or no doubt left about it. It seems to me the bill will be virtually emasculated if we proceed to enact it without including a definition of the word "laborers," as we understand it, and in the execution of that discretion which is left to us in the treaty so to define our meaning.

The question has occurred to me why it is that there should be any objection to allowing the friends of this measure to place it in a very distinct and unequivocal light before the world. Is it not, after all, a desire that Chinese laborers may be imported here in some form or under some pretext so that those who want a laboring class in the community deprived of the ballot may have an opportunity to be accommodated? We have one vast laboring class in this country to-day who hold the ballot, and it seems that they cannot be used, holding that ballot, for the purpose of preventing strikes among operatives, preventing labor-union leagues combining together on occasions to keep up the price of labor or to prevent capitalists from grinding them into the dust. The men who want to control the laborers of this country absolutely must have a lever by which they can bring pressure to bear upon the substratum of society In this country which we call the laboring classes of the country. it seems to me that the purpose has been made clear and distinct that those who expect to profit by the use of labor in this land, especially in the large factories and upon railways, and where immense numbers of men of this class are to be employed, have set themselves to work to introduce here in one way and another a class of men who can be controlled absolutely, because they have got no ballot to protect themselves with.

I have not heard as yet that anybody wants to give the Chinese the ballot, except perhaps the gentlemen who voted against the fourteenth section of the bill. Others assert that the law as it stands now excludes the Chinese from acquiring the benefits of naturalization in this country, which is attended by the use of the ballot, and that therefore such an enactment is unnecessary. If we have laws upon the statute-book which do exclude the Chinese from naturalization, it seems to me in dealing with this peculiar class of people under this bill we should be still more emphatic and still more decided in the announcement of our position, that they are not to be included in the rights of American citizenship either in the States or in the United States. Therefore, I thought that it was necessary to put that provision in the bill, so that our purpose might be fully and clearly disclosed to China as well as to our own people and the rest of the world; but it seems that some Senators here are opposed to that provision also. They want to leave the question open as to whether the Chinaman may be naturalized or not in the States, or, if you do not call it naturalized, that he may be put in such political condition as that he may enjoy the use of the ballot; still that provision has prevailed. The Senate, concurring with the House, has denied to the States and to the United States the power to confer the rights of citizenship upon Chinese. Then it seems that it became necessary that we should have a statute capable still further of being evaded, in order that a class might be drawn into the United States who would be so servile in their character as that they could be used to control the substratum of society here, the laboring classes, and who had no power to protect themselves by political organizations or an appeal to political forces. I am afraid that there is a good deal of that in the opposition to this bill. I prefer that the bill when it passes shall be passed in such a distinct and clear manner as to all of its provisions that no man here or in China may deny what we mean.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I propose to vote for the bill, and I am entirely indifferent whether the bill provides for an exclusion of ten years or one hundred years—whether it excludes the skilled or the unskilled Chinese labor. I think there can be no questioning the proposition that in every State and community in the United States, in every State possessing political power, when the people unanimously resolve that they do not desire a class of foreign immigrants to live among them, when they find in their social customs, their business habits, their personal habits, an antagonism which is revolting to the entire people of the State, it is a duty which Congress owes to protect that people from the settlement among them of a population entirely antagonistic to their habits, their religious beliefs, their political opinions, and their whole social, civil and economic polity.

I can well conceive how there may be such an antagonism—an antagonism resulting from education, resulting from political associations, resulting from habits that have become fixed and dominant among the people. I can readily appreciate the fact that in a community where political power depends upon the individual there can be the gravest reasons of state in addition to the economic and social reasons which would antagonize such a people with those resident and dominant there.

I can see much in this Chinese immigration which naturally produces that feeling, which properly produces that feeling. In the Constitution the language is explicit, and recognizes the right of a State to admit or exclude persons subject to the power of Congress, to prohibit their migration or their importation hither. The unquestionable power and, in my opinion, the unquestionable duty of Congress in such a case is to exercise that power for the protection of the people.

But when I have said that I have said all. My mind does not assent to many of the economic propositions which are presented here. I do not perceive that the protection of American labor is necessarily dependent upon the exclusion of this or the other class of people. I am not sure but that more powerful causes than the exclusion of any class of foreign immigration here, be they good or bad, are necessary for the protection of American labor against the power of competition. I do not wish to be committed to the economic ideas which are urged in support of the bill and which, in my judgment, will prove to be entire fallacies. The laws which regulate the comfort and well-being of the laborer ought to be the primary subject of consideration with every statesman, but how his condition is to be bettered by extravagant prices in the articles of subsistence, how famine prices dependent upon scarcity are to benefit the laborer, the poor wife and the poor child, or how an abundance and a cheap market of the necessaries of life are to injure him, are questions which have not been answered in this discussion, and I think perhaps it may be difficult to answer them.

Neither am I willing to be committed to the proposition that the virtue of our civilization, the religion of our civilization, can be overcome or even affected by any importation hither of Chinese. I believe as firmly as any in the superiority of the Caucasian race and that civilization which has come from it; and I believe so firmly in it that I believe all the Chinese in the world could not affect it or even corrupt it in the slightest degree. What political considerations might be necessary in order to regulate the status of such a people among us are in reason an entirely different ground for discussion and consideration. Therefore, sir, I am not willing, in supporting this bill to the fullest extent to which the people of the Pacific coast may desire it, to be committed to the proposition that the admission of any class of people into this country as laborers will of itself affect injuriously American labor, either degrade it or cheapen the price of labor. I do not believe as a principle of political economy, of industrial economy, that the proposition is a correct one.

It is demonstrable that where a man has land to work skilled labor, useful labor increasing the production of that land can do no harm to anybody; and even if it reduces the prices of the staples, of the productions which are grown upon it, that only contributes to the general wealth and to the individual wealth, and especially to the class of people who are most to be benefited, the laboring class, whose wages are always scant and less than they ought to be, and to whom the cheapness of the articles of subsistence is a matter of primary importance. But while this is true, the personal characteristics of the Chinese laborers, the personal and social characteristics of the Chinese who are brought here, are certainly very revolting, and are such as would naturally predispose, and properly predispose, any community against their admission in any number among them.

But, Mr. President, in the course of this debate allusion has been made to some similarity of circumstances supposed to exist between the people of the Southern States and their relations to the African in the past, and some supposed evil moral influences resulting from that. No arguments can be drawn from the relationship and the experience of the people of the Southern States with the African race. If the contact of the Mongolian with the civilization of this country, with Caucasian civilization, would have such beneficent effects as the contact of the Caucasian and the African race in the Southern States has had, it would be a most beneficent and happy influence. In no country in the world was there ever developed a higher class of people than the Caucasian, or white people of the Southern States, a people of higher individual character, of greater integrity, of greater devotion to liberty and to learning, of greater humanity, than was developed by the contact of those two races, the African and the Caucasian, in the South. So far as the African was concerned, brought from Africa a barbarian, of a different color and race and of the most opposite characteristics, he became a useful laborer, a member of the social family, and the records of the existence of that institution will exhibit as little of crime, as much of beneficence and of personal kindness as the relations of any people throughout the history of mankind.

While, therefore, the political complications which might ensue from the migration of the Chinese here is a subject certainly worthy of the consideration of statesmen, and while, in my judgment, an absolutely determining consideration for the passage of this bill is the entire unanimity with which the people of the Pacific coast demand this protection, it ought to be separated from these general considerations, it ought not to be placed upon the ground that there is an antagonism between the Asiatic civilization in China and the Caucasian civilization of ours which cannot be overcome and subjected to the needs of our higher and stronger race. For one, I do not give my assent to that proposition.

Again, Mr. President, this bill, while I shall vote for it, contains some features which characterize some of the legislation of this country which I think ought to be condemned. A few years ago a great political disturbance existed in this country in which the most violent feelings were evoked on either side. The result of that great civil commotion is to be found in various enactments which are still the law of this country, enactments which were contrary to the spirit and history of English law and liberty, enactments some of which are incorporated into this bill and of which the criticism may justly be made that it is more dangerous to introduce the Chinese administration of law, the Chinese despotism, the Chinese indifference to justice and right, than it is to introduce the Chinese laborer himself.

The spirit of English law, matured through many ages of resistance to oppression, of resistance to authority, to established authority, which the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] seems to consider as the determining point of moral and right conduct, the spirit of English liberty formed by resistance to established authority through all the long period of barbarism which followed the decline and fall of the Roman Empire, developed itself into a principle which had its origin in the condemnatory judgment of the lawyers and statesmen of Rome when the Roman Emperor caused his laws to be written in so fine a text that they could not be easily read and suspended them at a height from which they were inaccessible to the people. That principle was intended to prevent and prohibit punishment for crime except where the crime was defined and within the power of the subject of the law to ascertain and become advised of. It became a principle in English jurisprudence and in the law of all civilized peoples that no law for the punishment of crime should allow the act to be punished to rest in the bosom of the judge alone, when the person accused of a guilty violation of the law could have no knowledge of the unlawfulness of the act for which he was to be condemned, but, on the contrary, that it should be defined, it should be made clear, and it was only in the case of treason or offenses against the state, offenses relating to resistance to the divine right of kings, to a denial of established authority, that a criminal case was allowed to exist in intention alone, and to be the subject of arbitrary definition or interpretation by the judge.

In the Constitution of the United States this class of offenses is required to be proved by overt acts and by the testimony of witnesses, and the precept of the law itself was required to be plain and clear, in the words of that article of the Constitution which prohibits the deprival of life, liberty, and property without process of law, which by long-established judicial interpretations had the definite and precise meaning of "an impartial" trial, in which the accused, in the words of the Constitution, should be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation.

Departing from that rule and following the evil example of the statutes passed after civil war and for the accomplishment of partisan ends, a law is now proposed to be passed providing—and I allude to it because I wish to set myself in opposition to all legislation which would make acts criminal and not prescribe with definite certainty the act which is sought to be made a crime—

> That any person who shall knowingly aid or abet the bringing into the United States by land, or aid or abet the landing in the United States from any vessel of any Chinese person not lawfully entitled to enter the United States, &c.

No person can say what constitutes the act of "aiding and abetting." The judge alone must prescribe that. The judge alone must say when the man is upon trial, from the indictment that charges the act as criminal, whether that be an act aiding and abetting. It is within the objection of the class of legislation which has been condemned, and which is of the very spirit and essence of hostility to that civil liberty which culminated in a principle adopted for the protection of the people against arbitrary power, that there should be no crime that was not plainly expressed and defined, none which rested in the bosom of the judge for its definition, but of this nature was all that class of offenses which were created after the war for the punishment of the white people of the Southern States, and for the purpose of establishing by harsh and severe laws, resting entirely in the interpretation of the judge, the political domination of the African over the Caucasian race, and which are to be found in the Revised Statutes under the title of "Offenses against the elective franchise and civil rights."

I will read some of these enactments in order that we may see whether they are justly subject to the statement I have made and in order that we may compare them with this bill:

> If two or more persons conspire for the purpose of impeding, hindering, obstructing, or defeating, in any manner, the due course of justice in any State or Territory, with intent to deny to any citizen the equal protection of the laws, or to injure him or his property for lawfully enforcing, or attempting to enforce, the right of any person, or class of persons, to the equal protection of the laws;
> If two or more persons in any State or Territory conspire, or go in disguise on the highway or on the premises of another for the purpose of depriving, either directly or indirectly, any person or class of persons of the equal protection of the laws, or of equal privileges and immunities under the laws, or for the purpose of preventing or hindering the constituted authorities of any State or Territory from giving or securing to all persons within such State or Territory the equal protection of the laws.

Why, sir, all these laws are a disgrace to the spirit of the age, and an express and palpable violation of the Constitution of the United States and of all judicial procedure. There has not been a learned statesman, lawyer, or philosopher from the days of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus to this time who has not condemned the proposition contained in these laws. I ask Senators who defend these enactments to show a single respectable authority in all the ages in which we have any history of laws which justifies a law that leaves the definition and description of the offense in the bosom of the judge; and yet this statute-book is full of it. It is a practice in American legislation which is destructive of the Government and the liberties of the people, and ought to be condemned by all defenders of law and lovers of liberty—the practice of making public opinion, the clamor of the moment, attain its ends, whether they are those of party or passion, by subverting the fair and just administration of justice and making the judge a perjured prostitute in the exercise of the high duties of his great office, and not the fair and honest administrator of the law. I protest against it, sir, and I ask the learned Senator from Vermont to bring a solitary instance in all his learning of a respectable statesman, lawyer, jurist, historian, in all the ages of the past, who has justified the principle of the legislation contained in every one of those acts by which the act that constitutes the crime is left undecided, unprescribed, undefined; such that a judge may construe it at the moment, and without any previous knowledge of the accused, to be a criminal act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not know that I was the particular promoter of the Chinese bill, and therefore I do not know that I am called upon——

Mr. CALL. The honorable Senator has the reputation of being the author of these laws, against the elective franchise and civil rights to which I referred as well as the provisions of this bill to which I referred.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I am called upon to answer any defiance, certainly I am not in a fighting mood and I do not wish to answer any defiance; but if my distinguished friend from Florida really wishes me to respond, I will.

Mr. CALL. I do. The Senator can answer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand my friend's point to be that the statutes to which he has referred do not define with precision the acts to be punished, and that it is left to the discretion, arbitrary as he calls it, of the judge to find out precisely whether the act proved falls within the statute or not. I believe that is the point?

Mr. CALL. That is the point as stated by the honorable Senator. I do not say they do not define with precision; I say they do not define at all. They use terms of such broad generality that they leave it in the discretion of the judge to say that a man has committed a crime without his knowing that he was committing it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well, we will take it that way. I do not say whether that is a good point or not, because definitions are extremely difficult things, and when you undertake to make a definition in a statute it is usually quite as difficult to define your definition as it is to define the original proposition.

But my friend says that there is no parallel or precedent in history and so on in all the ages; I believe that was the phrase.

Mr. CALL. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not say there was no precedent. I said there was no precedent of a distinguished lawyer, statesman, jurist, or judge, who had ever justified such a thing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That comes then to a question of opinion as to what are distinguished lawyers, statesmen, and judges. When the treason act—I hope I do not offend anybody by using that phrase—when the treason act of 1790 was passed by men who thought themselves patriotic, who had won in civil war and established the independence of this country, men like Washington, and Madison, and Jefferson, and Randolph, and a great array of those names that we have all been taught to revere; when they came to provide laws for punishing according to the Constitution the crime of treason, they used language which was just as incapable of definition otherwise than by judicial interpretation applied to each case, as the language of the statutes that the Senator has referred to. I happen to have in my hand now, that I have turned to since the Senator's eloquence has aroused me to the exertion of opening a book, which says this:

That if any person or persons owing allegiance to the United States of America, shall levy war against them—

There is difficulty number one. Your accused is obliged to decide for himself and at his own peril, if he does anything, first, whether he owes allegiance, and on theories that we have heard expressed here for a few days back, nobody owes allegiance to any country so far as it regards the right to go away from it; a man can clear out from it in the midst of a war; that is one of the natural rights which some people have maintained; or he may think so. That raises a difficulty. Let us go to the next thing:

Shall levy war against them.

What constitutes levying war has puzzled the courts of the United States and every other country that has punished levying war against them by their own citizens. There is doubt number two, that this man is exposed to, that nobody but the judge can solve and the jury under his direction.

Or shall adhere to their enemies.

What is adhering to the enemy? Is it giving your son some bread when he has got on the wrong side and has come home for shelter? That is another of the difficulties that has troubled courts and everybody else.

Giving them aid and comfort.

That is, aiding and abetting them, although "comfort" is a much more indefinable, widespread, elastic phrase than "abetting." What is giving comfort to your enemy? Is it saying that some people in the State of Vermont, away back fifteen or twenty years ago, said that they thought certain people who were making war against the Government of the United States, or the Government of the United States against them, were right? Was not that a comfort to all those who were fighting for that great, now lost, cause, as it is called? Certainly it was a comfort, a great comfort; and yet, I suppose, the judge would have to decide, and he probably would decide, if he knew anything about law, that mere talk, mere opinion, did not amount to anything. And yet the man who is accused must submit to the judge and to the jury who tries his case whether he comes within the definition of having given comfort to the enemies of the United States.

Now we come to the second section of that act which the fathers passed, those great jurists, statesmen, scholars, philsophers, patriots, and taking all the rest of the vocabulary of my friend from Florida, that makes it still more difficult to require the poor culprit not only to know about his own acts, but he must know all the law:

That if any person or persons having knowledge of the commission of any of the treasons aforesaid.

And he is bound to judge at his own peril and decide as a lawyer and a judge whether any of the things that he knows of fall within the construction of the statute—

Shall conceal and not as soon as may be disclose and make known the same to the President of the United States, or some one of the judges thereof, &c.

He shall be sentenced to a severe penalty. There it is. Now I do not mean to say that the people who formed this Government and passed this law in 1790 were statesmen or scholars or patriots; I only say that up in my region of country we have been taught to suppose that they were, and that when they were defining crimes against the United States and providing for their punishment, they were obliged to use language such as they were accustomed to, the English language, and did the best they could, and having done that in describing the offense it must be left for the sake of liberty to the judge and the jury to determine, when the facts were proved, whether the man had committed that offense or not.

So I do not think it does for my distinguished friend to say that there is no human precedent among statesmen and patriots for general language in describing crimes. More mischief has been done everywhere in civilized countries by undertaking to make over-definitions in laws about crimes than there is in using general language.

Mr. CALL. Well, Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Vermont cannot even find a precedent which contains such language as I have read, such as this:

If two or more persons conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having so exercised the same; or if two or more persons go in disguise on the highway, or on the premises of another, with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege so secured, they shall be fined not more than $5,000 and imprisoned not more than ten years; and shall, moreover, be thereafter ineligible to any office or place of honor, profit, or trust created by the Constitution or laws the United States.

The honorable Senator, in the presence of the American Senate and the American people, as a logician and as a lawyer, undertakes to liken the language "treason against the United States shall consist in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort," to that statute, and as a man of reason and argument undertakes to say that there is no difference between the two or between the principle involved in the two. If he undertakes thereby to affirm that "aid and comfort" are not words of technical meaning defined in a thousand decisions through a hundred years of practice, if the honorable Senator means to say as his argument affirms that there is some kind of comparison between the language of the statutes he has read and those to which I have referred, I say again that the language he has cited from the statutes refers to definite acts, and has a well-known and long-established and easily-understood meaning, and no one of them makes an undefined act resting in intent alone a crime; no precedent is to be found of a criminal act of that character. Crimes resting in intent alone, without any overt act, the crime of the purpose of depriving persons directly or indirectly of the equal protection of the laws, or of equal privileges or immunities under the laws, or for the purpose of preventing or hindering the constituted authorities of any State or Territory from giving to all persons the equal protection of the laws, except in the excited animosity and violence of public clamor to which statesmen lend themselves when in times of civil commotion it may gratify the violent public opinion of the day and minister to party success.

I am happy to see the change that has come in the progress of time in the opinions of the learned Senator from Vermont and other Senators who are sustaining this bill. That is one thing that commends it to me. And while I feel it to be my duty to protest against that provision of the bill which makes an act criminal and subjects men to punishment without letting them know what they are punished for, without advising them what it is that they shall avoid doing to keep from being criminal—while I protest against that, I am very glad because in another respect even these provisions indicate a favorable change in the direction of sound legislation and a proper system of laws for the enforcement of justice.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my distinguished friend from Florida be good enough to tell me the change he understands to have come over the spirit of my dream, to use an old quotation?

Mr. CALL. I am just going to do it. As I have said before, the profession and the country and the world, for the fame of the Senator from Vermont is not circumscribed by the limits of this country, attribute to him the authorship of these laws which are found in the Revised Statutes under the head of "crimes against the elective franchise and the civil rights of citizens." I find in one of the sections a provision which I think is a little at variance with this bill, which it is understood comes from the hands of the Senator from Vermont, and is now before the Senate, the bill "to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese."

Every person who, under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, subjects, or causes to be subjected—

I will leave out the intermediate lines so as to show the context——

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the section?

Mr. CALL. Section 5510.

"Every person who, under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, subjects, or causes to be subjected," any alien or "any inhabitant" being an alien, "by reason of his color or race to different punishments, pains, or penalties on account of such inhabitant being an alien, or by reason of his color or race, than are prescribed for the punishment of citizens, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment not more than one year, or by both."

The learned Senator has a very happy way of making everything clear, particularly how infamous it is always to oppose established authority, but I would like to have him tell me how that provision agrees with this section of his proposed statute:

And any Chinese person found unlawfully within the United States shall be caused to be removed therefrom to the country from whence he came, by direction of the President of the United States.

Now, I should like him to tell me if he can take a citizen of the United States and by direction of the President of the United States remove him to the country from which he came? He will not say that he can. Here is a statute making it a crime and specially applicable to that people who inhabit the Southern States to do either directly or indirectly that which the Senator to-day proposes to require by law to be done to the Chinese alien inhabitants of States and Territories; that is to deprive them without crime of their liberty, extradite them to their country, and prescribes for them, in the language of his law, "on account of such inhabitant being an alien or by reason of his color and race different punishments than are prescribed for citizens."

In 1871 the honorable Senator, to the end that the white Caucasian race of the Southern States, as a penalty for resistance to the Union, might be subjected to the political domination of the African, whether native or foreign born, or of any other race who might go to these States, enacts a law that if any person, under color of any statute, regulation, ordnance, or custom, should subject, or cause to be subjected, any alien inhabitant of any State or Territory, by reason of his color or race, to different punishments, pains, or penalties than are prescribed for the punishment of citizens, he shall be fined $1,000 and imprisoned not more than one year, or both. Now, to the end that the Caucasian in the Pacific may be the dominant power, the Senator himself proposes to punish the alien inhabitants of the Territory or State by different pains and penalties because of his race and color.

I make this criticism upon this legislation not because I do not concur, for I do most heartily, in the purpose of protecting the inhabitants of the Pacific coast or of any other State requiring such protection from the migration or importation thither of any class of persons from Asia or anywhere else who are essentially hostile to those people, their interests, their sympathies, their religion, their social polity. If as a whole or with great unanimity they demand that their community shall not be invaded by that class of people, they have the right to do it. But I wish that this habit and disposition of American legislation which seeks to make use of the courts, of the temple of justice, of the judicial character, to prostitute the judge and make him a perjured man, to use the powers of legislation for political and party ends, may be rebuked. The exercise of the law-making power should be governed by considerations of the public and general welfare; the strifes of party should not be known in the laws of the country and judgments of the courts; both should be purged and cleansed from these impurities and corruptions.

I hope that the spirit of American legislation will be one of direct purpose, of direct enactment, and instead of affirming in regard to these Chinese that here is a bill to execute certain treaty stipulations with the Chinese, I should prefer the more manly and direct form of declaring the coming of the Chinese here to be an intolerable evil; not to endanger the good order of certain localities but to be an intolerable evil to the social system, and the political and economical system of the people of California and of the Pacific coast, as they understand it, and directly to affirm a prohibition.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I think the insertion of the word "skilled" in this bill as applied to "laborers" is essential to a fair and frank and open exposition of the intentions of those who are in favor of its passage. In the papers communicated to us by the President there is the memorandum of the Chinese minister, in these words:

The inclusion of "skilled labor" in the bill is in addition to the words and intent of the treaty. It will operate with harshness upon a class of Chinese merchants entitled to admission to the United States under the terms of the treaty. The shoe merchants and cigar merchants of China manufacture the goods they sell at their places of business, and to shut out the "skilled labor" they need would practically shut them out as well, since it would prevent them from carrying on their business in this country. The laundryman who keeps his shop and has a small capital with which to prosecute his trade cannot in any just sense be included in the class of "laborers," and the merchant tailor comes in the same category.

This explains the understanding of the Chinese minister in relation to the use of the term "laborers" in the bill and in the treaty. He says that all those who labor as shoemakers, or cigar-makers, or washermen, or as tailors, are skilled laborers, and therefore not comprised within the term laborers as used in the treaty. Now, I submit that if the cigarmaker, the shoemaker, the washerman, the tailor, are skilled laborers and not within the meaning of the treaty and the law, then the carpenter, the blacksmith, the painter, the printer, the carriage-driver, the cook, the household servant, the mechanic, any one who has learned any trade, however imperfectly, are equally skilled laborers, and also within the exemption of the treaty. You might go further and say that the man who lays the ties upon the railroad and adjusts the tracks that go to the Pacific coast are skilled laborers also.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PENDLETON. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can almost assume what the answer will be. My question is whether he does not desire on this occasion to observe good faith toward the Government of China and not go beyond by this legislation what the treaty has provided?

Mr. PENDLETON. I do sincerely desire that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Most clearly, then, may I not ask my friend, that being so, whether if this law contains the very language of the treaty, you have not certainly got all that the treaty provides for, be it much or little, to be determined in each particular case as it arises?

Mr. PENDLETON. It is very apparent that an interpretation has been put upon the word "laborers" by the minister of the Chinese Government which is entirely different from that put upon it by the people of this country generally and by the gentlemen in the Senate who are in favor of this bill. It appears in such authoritative form that the President has thought it important to send the paper here as part of his veto message. That being the case, that interpretation of the treaty by the highest official which the Chinese Empire has here among us being so formally laid before the Senate in such authoritative form, I think it becomes our duty not to assent to that interpretation; not by silence to give our consent to it; but by a declaration of the highest legislative body in the country to indicate that such is not our understanding of the meaning of the treaty. I think that frankness, fair and open legislation require that we should say, and and say in this authoritative form, that the interpretation of the Chinese authorities communicated to us by the President is not the interpretation in which we concur.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask my friend to tell me again—for I have not understood his answer perfectly—whether he does not think that if we use in the law the very words of the treaty, the law by a just and upright court will be construed to have all the value and the scope that the words in the treaty can possibly have? That is what I should like to understand my friend's view about, because I respect his opinion.

Mr. PENDLETON. It is perfectly plain that if we follow in the law the language of the treaty we get all that under the treaty we ought to have; but it is also perfectly plain that an interpretation authoritative on one side has been put upon this treaty here in our own capital, in our own midst, sent to us under circumstances of a good deal of form entirely different from that which the vast majority of our people and of this Congress believe to be true, and therefore I am in favor of stating in the language of the law our dissent from that interpretation, and not remitting it without our dissent to the courts of the country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very good, Mr. President.

Mr. PENDLETON. I will exclude the conclusion that we concur in that interpretation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very good, Mr. President. Inasmuch as that interpretation is ab extra and not a part of the text of our treaty, our contrary interpretation, also ab extra, in our debates and considerations, and not of the text of the treaty, or the law, leaves the two things exactly where they are. That is to say, the Chinese think the treaty means one thing, I will assume; we say it means another. We put the law in the very language of the treaty. Then it comes before our own tribunals, not theirs, because all there is in this law is to have effect in this country of course, to be carried out in this country. Our own tribunals are to say what this treaty and this law mean. On the other hand if we by a definition in the law take up a doctrine that our own tribunals hold is not within the treaty, the law nevertheless stands valid, but we have not kept faith with the Government of China. There is the difficulty. I do not think a court could be in the least influenced by the Chinese interpretation.

My friend will pardon me for taking so long in interrupting him. I do not think any court could by any possibility be influenced in its just decision by any interpretation that the Chinese Government put upon this treaty or any construction of it, when, in our own debates, as my friend is now so well doing, we, following the language of the treaty, not the law, say that we do not admit of that interpretation of the treaty; we hold that those words do not mean that thing; but it must be left—unless we are to assume that we will overrule the treaty if it turns out to go too far—it must be left to our own tribunal to determine what it means.

Then, if my friend will pardon me, last of all I wish to ask him, and I shall have done and thank him for his kindness——

Mr. PENDLETON. It does not interrupt me disagreeably at all. It is a pleasure to hear the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How much good do we get by using the words "skilled laborers" or "artisans," or any other term of that kind? Is not that just as difficult of definition as the other, and more difficult, possibly? Is it not safer for our own interests in the protection that our friends on the Pacific coast feel so largely the importance of, to leave those words untouched for application to every phase of circumstances that may arise and with the courts untrammeled by a statute that binds them although they might say the treaty gave them a larger liberty than the statute itself did?

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I can only repeat what I have already said in answer to the Senator from Vermont, that inasmuch as the President of the United States has communicated to Congress as one of the supports of the veto message this interpretation of the treaty, by the highest authority of China in this land, an interpretation which I venture to say is contrary to that given to it by nineteen-twentieths of the people of the United States, and evidently contrary to the interpretation given to it by two-thirds at least of the members of Congress, it is our duty in the interest of open and frank legislation to put also our interpretation upon the words of the treaty.

I go further. I say that good faith toward the officers of this Government whom we charge with the difficult and delicate duty prescribed by this act; good faith to the Chinamen who may come to this country believing that they are within the exceptions of the law and as to whom we intend to apply the strong measure of deportation; good faith to both these classes requires that we should speak with no uncertain voice and that we should put into this law the interpretation of the treaty which we believe that it can fairly bear. And I have the less difficulty in coming to this conclusion because I find here in the treaty itself a provision looking to the fact that the legislation of Congress may seem to the authorities of China hard, unjust, inconsistent with the treaty, and stipulating that the legislation shall be communicated to the imperial authorities of China by the Secretary of State in order that representations may be made by the Chinese minister to the officials of the United States and a conference may be had to the end "that mutual and unqualified benefit may result."

Therefore it is that I would put into this law our interpretation of the treaty, and if in the opinion of the Chinese authorities such legislation shall seem to transgress the limits of the treaty in any respect, representations may be made to us, which I am sure that the executive department in its diplomatic capacity, and the legislative department will respectfully heed.

Mr. President, I do not like the feature of deportation contained in this bill. It does not meet the hearty assent of my judgment. I yield my objection very reluctantly to the opinions and wishes of my friends who have charge of the bill.

The distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM] yesterday came, it seemed to me, with a good deal of speed to the defense of the President in regard to what he was pleased to call an insinuation of criticism, because the President had introduced into his veto message the memorandum of the Chinese minister. I think the Senator himself gave a very appropriate answer to any such criticism, if indeed it was made, as I did not observe. I think he illustrated a statement I have somewhere seen of fleeing when no man pursueth, and of an uneasy conscience needing no accuser. But there is a passage in the veto message to which I think exception may be fairly taken, and which I intend to read to the Senate. The President in his veto message, in discussing this question of reasonable suspension of Chinese immigration, says:

> I regard this provision of the act as a breach of our national faith; and being unable to bring myself in harmony with the views of Congress on this vital point, the honor of the country constrains me to return the act with this objection to its passage.

The honor of the country! Here are two hundred and fifty out of three hundred members of Congress who have declared upon their oaths and with as high sense of what the honor of the country requires as the President can possibly have that this act is proper and right. The President of the United States says to these members of Congress who have voted for the bill, men who represent the people and the States, men who are bound by the same oath that he is, "You have forgotten the interests of the country, you have tarnished its fair fame, you have violated its plighted faith; I cannot agree with you; I, for the honor of the country, return this bill to you with my veto!"

Sir, if I chose to indulge in recrimination I might well ask who made him to sit in judgment upon the acts of members and to declare that the honor of the country requires that their action shall be condemned. But I do not I remember the injunction: "Thou shalt not speak evil of the rulers of thy people." I content myself with saying that the deduction from the argument made by the President himself, contained in this message and the accompanying papers, is entirely incorrect. I say, further, that such language used by one co-ordinate branch of this Government to another is not calculated to promote the harmonious co-operation which is essential to the good administration of the Government.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] yesterday declared—and the suggestive truthfulness of the statement was enhanced by the magnetic intensity of his utterance—that in the concentric circles which lie around the human heart is to be found the true foundation of governments and states. He might have gone further; he might have said that there, and there alone, is to be found the foundation of society which underlies states and governments. The figure which he made use of suggests the necessity of guarding, protecting, purifying, exalting, elevating the aspirations and widening the scope of this human heart, which is the center and the source and the fountain out of which flow all the powers which not only maintain government and society, but give to it the aspiration and the propulsion of ever-advancing, ever-exalting civilization. I recognize that mysterious and almost mystic tie which binds together the nations and the races of the earth. "I am a man, and therefore nothing human is entirely alien to me." I believe in "the brotherhood of man." The very points of repulsion between nations and races are points of contact. These nations and races are scattered over all the world. Under every condition of climate, of habit, of tradition, of history, of association, of institutions, they are working out their several functions in the advancement of their civilizations. Some of them are drinking to the dregs waters that are foul with all the vices and the crimes which the taste and the passions and the utterly depraved imagination of the human heart can invent; others are reaping the reward of attempts, however imperfect, to attain to that divine humanity whose highest expression, in the words of the Master, was "Bear ye one another's burdens." They are all men, they are all human beings; I believe they are all working out, in one form and another, their progress and advancement and improvement. I would do nothing here or elsewhere, as an individual, as a legislator, as a patriot, as a cosmopolitan which I believed would not aid them in this effort.

But, sir, we must remember that contact, association, immigration are not the only means of aiding them. We must remember that you cannot touch pitch and remain undefiled; we must remember that you cannot plant virtue in the midst of surrounding and overwhelming vice and expect it to be uncontaminated; we must remember that you cannot plant the best virtues of the human heart in the foul pollutions of crime and vice and expect them to increase and grow. Mr. President, you cannot put the spot upon the camelia and expect it to retain its unsullied purity and whiteness. The spot will not grow white, but the camellia will be discolored and decay. In our practical life we do not take the pure virgins who are to be the mothers of the next generation and plant them in the haunts of vice in order to reclaim the vicious. We do not take the young men who will come to be the guardians of our civilization almost before we are able to realize the fact and associate them with the corrupt and licentious and depraved in order to win them from their evil ways. We cannot bring in upon our civilization on the Pacific coast the hordes of Chinese devoted to everything which is repugnant to our religion, to our morals, to our habits, to our civilization, and expect it to increase in purity and power there.

Mr. President, there are experiences which every individual and nation and race must make, relying on its own strength and at its own peril. Through the dark valleys of life and of death they must go alone. Look around you. The African race through the wrongs and sufferings and agonies of American slavery has reached to-day its highest advancement. At the very moment that it has developed this result of its pains and its sufferings, Stanley is exploring the interior of the Dark Continent, certainly to show the contrast, possibly to invite them to a congenial home upon their ancestral continent. The Japanese Empire rousing itself into a new life is advancing rapidly in the best direction, not by deporting its people, not by sending them off to other climes, but by making that beautiful empire a fit abode for higher and better civilization and inviting immigration to its shores.

It may be, sir, that this very bill we are passing to-day will awaken the authorities of the Chinese Empire to such an appreciation of the fact that their hordes are down in the very depths of a most degraded corruption—will so startle them with the conviction that we, their best friends and neighbors, can not endure the contact—that they will bring all the resources of government and institutions of education and example, to lift up their people until they shall be also fitted to join in the advancement of the races.

I said that the nations and the races were all working out, each in its appropriate sphere, in different ways, in different conditions, under different circumstances, its own advancement. Everywhere, as far as my eye can reach throughout the domain of the world I see progress. It may be, it gives me pleasure to think, that they are preparing themselves for the time when the common Father shall meet the prodigal son returning from his evil ways and his destitute condition, and shall welcome him to his ancestral home, while at the same time he soothes the susceptibility of the older and the better son by saying to him, "It was meet that we should rejoice when the dead is alive again and the lost is found."

It may be that these nations and races now are members of one body, each performing its functions, some of honor and some of dishonor, and only preparing for that time when corruption shall be raised in incorruption and dishonor shall be raised in glory. When Attila, with his barbarous hosts, assaulted Rome, the senate asked, "What shall we give as our ransom?" "Your gold and your jewels, your statues and your pictures, your costly furnitures and luxurious couches, and free your slaves." "What shall we have left?" said the degenerate Romans. The proud, self-reliant, amazed barbarian replied, "I leave you your own souls."

Alison has said "that nations, like individuals, were not destined for immortality; that in their virtues equally as in their vices, in their grandeur as in their weakness, they bear in their bosoms the seeds of mortality; but that in the passions which elevate them to greatness or hasten their decay there is to be found the unceasing operation of those principles of corruption and resurrection which, applicable alike to communities as individuals, compensate the necessary decline of nations by the vital fire which gives undecaying youth to the human race." Ay, sir, "undecaying youth to the human race;" youth, ever hoping, aspiring, daring, doing. Its course is ever upward and onward; upward and onward as the eagle when, soaring on unwearied wing, he looks with unblenched eye into the sun; upward and onward as the aspiration of the human soul when it seeks perfection in the Christian's heaven! And in these efforts of all races, of all nations, of all conditions of men we must remember, as has been said, that "no truth is ever lost, no truth ever perishes from the earth. The flame is undying though generations disappear. Whenever a moral truth has started into life humanity claims and guards the bequest, and each generation, gathering together the imperishable sons of the past, increases them with the sons of light, radiant with a like immortality."

Sir, I believe thoroughly in this advancement of our race; I believe, in the sense in which I have spoken, in its kinship; I believe in the possibility of its development; and I believe through its efforts, through its ambitions, through its aspirations, through its struggles, that the world will finally be brought to a condition such as we may believe the divine Maker, with divine benevolence, intended that it should be. But, sir, if it is to be so, this undying race, strong in perennial youth, will see men and nations and generations and ages failing in the effort, wearied, exhausted. It will mount higher and still higher; it will pass beyond the utmost reach of each advancing generation—

> Still from the sky serene and far
> A voice falls like a falling star, > Excelsior!

Mr. President, let us, our American nation, our American civilization, lead in the van of that effort, and let us do it by purifying, preserving, maintaining, consecrating the virtues which we have thus far attained, let us not endanger them by association with vice and corruption, which can only contaminate and destroy.

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. President, I briefly called attention yesterday to the fourth article of the treaty in pursuance of which we are now attempting to frame legislation. We have had two treaties with the Empire of China. Under the operation of the first, which is commonly known as the Burlingame treaty, a constant acceleration and increase in the importance of our intercourse with Chinese has been the result. There never has been any disturbance whatever of our relations with the empire under that treaty. We are now attempting by legislation to carry out the provisions of the second treaty, which was promulgated in October last, the sole object of which was to enable us to regulate the emigration from China to this country; not to destroy it, not to annihilate it, but to regulate it.

The two Houses of Congress passed a bill upon the subject, which was sent to the President of the United States, and the President in some mode, I know not precisely how, obtained the opinion of the Chinese minister resident here as to the views his government would entertain with respect to the provisions of that bill. The objections he made to it were very pointed indeed. What he said with reference to embracing in our law the term "skilled laborer" as one of the definitions of labor has been read by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] and every gentleman on this floor will say that it is a radical objection to the provisions of the bill so far as it attempts to define what is meant by the term "laborer." But this is not all which the memorandum says by way of instruction to us. The fourth clause of the memorandum is in these words:

> If the bill becomes a law, it will leave the impression in China that its government strangely misunderstood the character of the treaty, or that the Congress has violated some of its provisions, and this will tend to prejudice the intelligent classes against the United States Government and people, whom they now greatly admire and respect.

I understand the honorable Senator from Ohio to say that because of this he finds an additional reason for incorporating in the bill this definition as to what is meant by the term "laborer;" in other words he proposes that we shall by this act of Congress defy the interpretation put upon that term in the treaty by the Chinese Government and its authorities. Is that to work harmony between us and China as nations? Is that to work out the beneficial ends which were designed by this treaty and which are foreshadowed in the fourth article of the treaty, to which I called attention yesterday? On the contrary, it would be just as effectual by way of disrupting our relations as would the signing of the first bill by the President in the face of this memorandum or protest, whatever it may be called, if the President had affixed his signature to it and it had become a law. We should pause in view of this expression on the part of the Chinese Government, and see whether we are not hasty in this our first legislation with a view of carrying out the provisions of this treaty.

I turn to the language of the first article of the treaty, and I submit that its interpretation will not justify any such legislation as is contained in the section proposed to be stricken out. "The limitation or suspension," says this article, "shall be reasonable and shall apply only to Chinese who may go to the United States as laborers, other classes not being included in the limitation." They understand by that that the term "skilled laborers" is not within the fair definition of the language of the treaty; and that being the understanding of the Government of China, in the face of this to re-enact this provision would just as grossly insult the views of China in this respect as for the President to have sanctioned the bill against which this utterance was made. Now, suppose the President had signed the bill which was passed by the two Houses and the next day the Chinese minister had come to the Secretary of State in pursuance of the fourth article of the treaty and said, "You have passed a law which is a direct violation of the understanding of my government in regard to this treaty, and I demand that it shall have immediate modification," where would be our relief? Either Congress must recede and amend the law or the two nations must at once be at variance with each other. For us to re-enact the provision which the Chinese minister regards so at variance with the whole policy of this treaty would only tend, instead of rendering this arrangement a beneficial one for the two governments, to produce an alienation between us and the Chinese Government and to deprive us of all the benefits which have resulted from our relations under the treaty which was first framed.

Mr. President, I have looked over the treaty promulgated in October last, and I confess its reading has forced upon my mind the fear that there existed in the minds of the persons who negotiated it an idea that by its operation advantages might be gained over China which China did not contemplate. Sir, I remember that the severest criticism we have ever pronounced upon the Government of Great Britain have been criticisms upon its policy of exercising the arts of diplomacy to gain treaties from the weaker powers of the earth, and then enforcing them at the point of the bayonet. I see how sensitive the public mind is at this moment at the mere suggestion that there was recently a purpose to interfere with the republics of South America in our transactions. Shall we in this manner, against the protest of the Chinese minister, at once enter upon a line of policy which may subject our Government to the imputation of having designed or been guilty of the same purpose? I trust not. I trust, on the contrary, we shall enter into this legislation in the spirit in which the treaty was formed; in the spirit embodied in the fourth article of the treaty; that we will not frame laws which we know are at variance with the wishes, feelings, and views of China in respect to this question. We had better begin in another mode which will lead to the continuance of amicable relations between us and them.

I do not desire to prolong this discussion, but I intend, before the final vote is taken upon this bill, in pursuance of the fourth article of the treaty, to offer, by way of amendment to the bill, a provision which I now send to the Secretary for the purpose of having it read for information, which, it seems to me, is the only one that can prolong our amicable relations with the Chinese Government.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

> SEC. —. The provisions of this act shall be open and subject to modification from time to time as may be found necessary and as may be assented to by the representatives of the two governments as provided in the fourth article of the treaty proclaimed on the 5th day of October, 1881.

Mr. LAPHAM. In this way, and in this way only, in view of what we have here from the Chinese minister, can we hope to maintain friendly relations and hope for a continuance of our profitable commerce with the great Empire of China. The moment we shut down the door and preclude ourselves from the power to make changes, that moment our relations with them are gone.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I hope we shall take a vote on this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in striking from the bill the fifteenth section.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section will be read for information.

The Acting Secretary read the fifteenth section, as follows:

> SEC. 15. That the words "Chinese laborers," wherever used in this act, shall be construed to mean both skilled and unskilled laborers and Chinese employed in mining.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote is to concur with the action of the Committee of the Whole striking out this section.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]

Mr. FARLEY, (when Mr. BAYARD'S name was called.) The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] has informed me in writing that he desires it to be understood that if he was here he would vote against the amendment reported by the committee, and is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

Mr. HARRIS, (when Mr. JACKSON'S name was called.) I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. JACKSON] is absent and is paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. MCDILL.] My colleague, if here, would vote "nay."

The words "Chinese laborers," wherever used in this act, shall be construed to mean persons usually engaged in manual labor.

I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]

Mr. CONGER, (when Mr. FERRY'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. FERRY] is paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] If he were here, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. ROLLINS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WINDOM (when his name was called.) But for my pair with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS,] I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.] I would vote "nay," if he were present.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 25; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend section 14 by striking out all after the word "that" and inserting:

Nothing in this act shall be construed to change the existing naturalization laws so as to admit Chinese persons to citizenship.

Mr. President, as this section now stands in the bill, it is the first time in the history of this nation that Congress has undertaken to make prohibitions against naturalization. The Constitution provides that Congress may make uniform rules of naturalization, so that no person can be admitted to citizenship without affirmative action by Congress. I do not wish for one to have Congress enact any statute which shall prohibit by affirmative declaration any person from becoming a citizen. He cannot become a citizen until Congress shall affirmatively provide that he may; and as this section now stands, it is absolutely unique, probably not only in the history of this country but of every other, and so I move this change so as to leave the law just as it is now in order to avoid what hereafter will be a very unhappy precedent, I am afraid, for a good many people.

Mr. BUTLER. May we have the section read as it stands in the bill and as it is proposed to be amended?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

The Acting Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now read the section proposed to be stricken out, so that the Senators can see the difference.

The Acting Secretary read section 14 of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 14. That hereafter no State court or court of the United States shall admit Chinese to citizenship; and all laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WINDOM (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] on this question.

Mr. MCDILL. I am paired on this question with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JACKSON.]

Mr. KELLOGG. I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—16.

Allison,	Dawes,	Harrison,	Lapham,
Blair,	Edmunds,	Hawley,	Morrill,
Conger,	Frye,	Hill of Colorado,	Platt,
Davis of Illinois,	Hale,	Ingalls,	Saunders,

NAYS—25.

Beck,	Garland,	Jonas,	Slater,
Butler,	George,	Jones of Nevada,	Vance,
Call,	Grover,	Maxey,	Walker,
Chilcott,	Hampton,	Miller of Cal.,	Williams.
Coke,	Harris,	Morgan,
Fair,	Hoar,	Pendleton,
Farley,	Johnston,	Pugh,

ABSENT—35.

Aldrich,	Ferry,	McDill,	Saulsbury,
Anthony,	Gorman,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Bayard,	Groome,	McPherson,	Sewell,
Brown,	Hill of Georgia,	Mahone,	Sherman,
Camden,	Jackson,	Miller of N. Y.,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Pa.,	Jones of Florida,	Mitchell,	Vest,
Cameron of Wis.,	Kellogg,	Plumb,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Lamar,	Ransom,	Windom.
Davis of West Va.,	Logan,	Rollins,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to strike out, in the first line of section 10, the word "master" and insert the word "owner."

Section 10 declares that if the master of any vessel shall knowingly violate any of the provisions of this act the vessel shall be deemed forfeited to the United States. I would respectfully submit that inasmuch as the masters of vessels are subjected to severe penalties for any violation of the act, and inasmuch as provisions are made for returning to the country from which they came the Chinese laborers who are brought here in violation of the act, it is cruel and unusual punishment to say that the innocent owner of a vessel that may bring Chinese laborers to this country should suffer forfeiture for an act for which he is not responsible. It seems to me it is carrying the penalties of this act too far.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senate having refused to leave out of this bill the fourteenth and fifteenth sections, I shall not be able to vote for it as otherwise I should.

As to the fourteenth section, this is the first time in the history of this country and I think of any other that the governing legislative power has undertaken to make an affirmative prohibition against the admission to citizenship of any race.

The fifteenth section to my mind is objectionable, not only because it does not follow the fair language of the treaty, be it much or little, to be determined by our own courts, but because it removes the question into still greater doubt than it was before. There is nothing so incapable of definition as a definition itself; and, therefore, if I lived in San Francisco and had all the feeling, wise or unwise, that our friends on the Pacific coast have about this business, and wished to exclude to the uttermost the Chinamen, I should stand by that broad, undefined language of the treaty and try each case upon it.

The Senate has thought it fit to keep both those sections in, and, therefore, I cannot vote for the bill; so that my interest in it has departed; but it is right to say as to the motion of my friend from Kansas that this provision of forfeiture is exactly, I think, like that as to mere smuggling of a package of silks on a French steamship or anything else—where the master knowingly allows smuggling to go on upon a vessel the owner forfeits it. So, then, the punishment, as it is called, is not probably cruel or unusual. I only mention that for the history of the law of the subject for the reason that the Senate has put the bill in a shape that I am unable to vote for it.

Mr. INGALLS. The difference between the case of smuggling and that mentioned in this bill is that in cases of smuggling the Secretary of the Treasury, as I understand, has authority, if in his discretion it is proper, to permit that portion of the penalty to be omitted, and, as a matter of fact, I believe that there is not an instance where a vessel has been forfeited because it bore smuggled goods if it appeared that the owner knew nothing about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM] proposed an amendment, which will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as an additional section:

SEC. —. The provision of this act shall be open and subject to modification from time to time as may be found necessary, and as may be assented to by the representatives of the two governments, as provided in the fourth article of the treaty proclaimed on the 5th day of October, 1881.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York, [Mr. LAPHAM.]

The amendment was rejected.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall this bill pass?

Mr. FARLEY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALDRICH, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN.] If he were present, I should vote "nay" and the Senator from Maryland would vote "yea."

Mr. ANTHONY, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this bill with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CONGER, (when Mr. FERRY's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. FERRY] is paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I was paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] but that pair has been transferred, with the consent of the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS,] to the latter. If the Senator from Mississippi were present, he would vote "yea." I vote "nay."

Mr. McDILL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JACKSON.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. JONAS, (when Mr. MCPHERSON'S name was called.) The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] is paired with his colleague, [Mr. SEWELL.] If present, Mr. MCPHERSON would vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON. It should also be stated that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] would vote "nay."

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] I do not know how he would vote on this bill in its present form, but if he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.] I understand from his colleague that if he were here he would vote "nay." I should vote "yea."

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) The pair has been announced by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] as having been changed between himself and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] to myself and that Senator. If the Senator from Mississippi were here, I should vote "yea."

Several SENATORS. So would he.

Mr. WINDOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.] I should vote "nay," but for that.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS. If my colleague [Mr. JACKSON] were here—he is absent and paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. MCDILL,]—he would vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. FARLEY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. ROLLINS.] If the Senator from Florida were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SAUNDERS. In the transfer there seems to have been some mistake. I intended to vote "yea" on the bill, and so announced when I stated my pair. I do not understand how the Senator on the other side would vote.

Mr. GEORGE. My colleague [Mr. LAMAR] would vote "yea," if he were here.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Then I had better vote.

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I vote "yea."

Mr. KELLOGG. Now I ask leave to withdraw my vote, and announce the pair between myself and the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.] He would vote "yea" and I "nay," if he were here.

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—32.

Beck,	Farley,	Johnston,	Pugh,
Butler,	Garland,	Jonas,	Saunders,
Call,	George,	Jones of Nevada,	Slater,
Cameron of Wis.,	Grover,	Maxey,	Vance,
Chilcott,	Hale,	Miller of Cal.,	Van Wyck,
Coke,	Hampton,	Miller of N. Y.,	Vest,
Davis of Illinois,	Harris,	Morgan,	Walker,
Fair,	Hill of Colorado,	Pendleton,	Williams.

NAYS—15.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Hoar,	Morrill,
Blair,	Frye,	Ingalls,	Platt,
Conger,	Harrison,	Lapham,	Sherman.
Dawes,	Hawley,	McMillan,

ABSENT—29.

Aldrich,	Ferry,	Logan,	Saulsbury,
Anthony,	Gorman,	McDill,	Sawyer,
Bayard,	Groome,	McPherson,	Sewell,
Brown,	Hill of Georgia,	Mahone,	Voorhees,
Camden,	Jackson,	Mitchell,	Windom.
Cameron of Pa.,	Jones of Florida,	Plumb,
Cockrell,	Kellogg,	Ransom,
Davis of West Va.,	Lamar,	Rollins,

So the bill was passed.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. VANCE, Mr. PLATT, and Mr. MCDILL the committee to investigate the administration of affairs in the sixth collection district of North Carolina, under the resolution of the 21st instant.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. MILLER, of New York, a member of the Committee on Education and Labor, in place of Mr. MORRILL, resigned.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. JOHN BAILEY, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 1598) to authorize the Secretary of War to donate to the Ladies' Soldiers' Monument Society of Portsmouth, Ohio, four condemned cannon; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4680) to repeal the discriminating duties on goods produced east of the Cape of Good Hope.

PURCHASE OF COPIES OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to purchase for the use of the Senate 25 copies of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to be paid for from appropriations for miscellaneous expenses of the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. I wish the Senator from Ohio would include the supplement.

Mr. SHERMAN. This includes all the Revised Statutes. We are in absolute need of them daily, and must have them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would be better to insert "and supplement."

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well. Say "the Revised Statutes and supplement."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

THOMAS EVANS AND ALBERT T. WHITING.

Mr. VANCE. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2938) for the relief of Thomas Evans, to report it with an amendment, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 2938) for the relief of Thomas Evans was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the auditor of the District of Columbia to issue to Thomas Evans a duplicate certificate for one lost or burned, numbered 21609, of the board of audit, class 6, for $146.20.

The amendment was to add:

And also a similar duplicate certificate to Albert T. Whiting, for one lost or burned, numbered 19555, for $532.48: Provided, That they shall each execute severally a bond to the commissioners of the District of Columbia, in double the amount of their respective certificates, with sufficient security, conditioned to save harmless the said District against the possible presentation of said lost certificates; and said certificates shall be received and converted into 3.65 bonds, as all board of audit certificates are, by the Treasurer of the United States, as commissioner of the sinking-fund of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Thomas Evans and Albert T. Whiting."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill establishing a court of appeals.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to appeal to the Senator from Arkansas and to the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Was not that bill laid aside informally two or three days ago?

Mr. GARLAND. It lapsed under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It lost its place. The Senator from Tennessee proposes to supplement the motion with another.

Mr. HARRIS. In view of the fact that the bill referred to by the Senator from Arkansas was displaced, having had the right of way, I am inclined to appeal to the Senator from Arkansas not to antagonize his motion; and also to appeal to the Senate to proceed at this time to consider Senate bill No. 1049, being a bill amending an act entitled "An act to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield for that motion?

Mr. GARLAND. I am on the committee that reported the bill which the Senator from Tennessee refers to, and I am also on the committee that reported this other bill. I leave it to the Senate which they will take up.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senate cannot decide unless some motion is made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas moves to take up the bill to establish a court of appeals.

Mr. HOAR. I waived a bill which I was very anxious to have taken up, and which has been waiting a great while, recognizing the prior claim of the Senator from Arkansas; but I do not wish to recognize his right to mortgage that claim to anybody else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to take up the court of appeals bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 420) to establish a court of appeals.

Mr. MORRILL. The bill being taken up so as to be the unfinished business, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eighteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 28, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

RAILROAD LAND-GRANT IN MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6017) supplemental to an act entitled "An act granting public lands in alternate sections to the State of Mississippi to aid in the construction of railroads in said State, and for other purposes," approved August 11, 1856; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

FORT RICE MILITARY RESERVATION, DAKOTA.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 2749) vacating the Fort Rice military reservation, in the Territory of Dakota, be taken from the House Calendar and put on its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all the lands embraced in the Fort Rice military reservation, in the Territory of Dakota, be, and the same are hereby, opened and made subject to entry as other public lands in said Territory under existing laws: Provided, That all persons owning improvements on said reservation at the time of the passage of this act shall have a prior right to enter the lands upon which said improvements are located at any time within six months after this act goes into effect.

SEC. 2. That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be, and hereby is, authorized to issue the instructions necessary to carry the provisions of this act into effect.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. PETTIGREW. This bill has been favorably reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, and is also recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and by the War Department. I have their letters.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

PROTECTION OF USERS OF PATENTS.

Mr. CASWELL. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Patents for immediate consideration a substitute for House bill No. 784. The bill is simply for the protection of parties using patents which they have purchased in good faith in open market.

Mr. BLAND. What is the bill?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. We reserve objection until the bill has been read.

Mr. BLAND. I object, if it is for the extension of any patent.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. It is not for that purpose.

Mr. BLAND. Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It is for the benefit of the purchaser.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. It is to protect the innocent purchasers of a patented article.

Mr. BLAND. I object, if it is to extend any patent.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It is to curtail the power of patentees.

Mr. CASWELL. I am directed by the Committee on Patents to report, as a substitute for House bill No. 784, a bill (H. R. No. 6018) to amend section 4919 of the Revised Statutes relating to the recovery of damages for the infringement of patents, which I ask the clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

No action for damages or proceeding in equity shall be sustained, nor shall the party be held liable under sections 4919 or 4921 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, for the use of any patented article or device when it shall appear on the trial that the defendant in such action or proceeding purchased said article for a valuable consideration in the open market.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. CASWELL. I ask the bill and report be printed.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I must object to its present consideration.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Will not the gentleman from New York withdraw his objection a moment to allow an explanation?

Mr. HUTCHINS. It seems to me that a bill of that kind, nullifying the patent laws of the United States, ought not to pass without our understanding it.

Mr. CASWELL. It only prohibits recovery against a party who has purchased a single article, and is using it, and has purchased it for a valuable consideration in open market.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It is in behalf of the users of patented articles.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the objection is withdrawn.

Mr. WILLIS. This is to protect the purchasers?

Mr. CASWELL. It is to protect the users. It applies to any person who has purchased in open market for a valuable consideration, and is using the article.

Mr. ATKINS. Is it in the interest of the users?

Mr. CASWELL. It is in the interest of the user.

Mr. ATKINS. If it is in the interest of the public, I have no objection.

Mr. VANCE. This has received the unanimous consent of the Committee on Patents, and also the approval of the Commissioner of Patents, and it has been petitioned for extensively by the people.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The same kind of bill was reported in the last Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Yes; I object.

Mr. CASWELL. I ask it be placed on the House Calendar and the bill and report be printed.

The bill was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CASSIDY. I move by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. No. 1287, for action at this time. It is a matter of considerable importance to the people of my State.

Mr. DUNNELL. The regular order has been called for.

Mr. JOYCE. And I have been recognized to make reports from a committee.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. REED. It is absolutely essential to the administration of public justice the bill of the gentleman from Nevada should be passed, and I hope that gentlemen will permit it to be read so they may know what they are objecting to.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his objection until he hears the bill read?

The SPEAKER. The bill is not here.

Mr. ELLIS. The demand for the regular order is withdrawn.

COMPLETION OF PENSION APPLICATIONS.

Mr. JOYCE, by unanimous consent, from the Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3887) to extend the time allowed in paragraph 3 of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes of the United States to certain classes of applicants for pensions to complete their applications; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

RATE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. JOYCE also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 5261) to amend title 57 (pensions) of the Revised Statutes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

NAVIGATION OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I move by unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 1572) for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ELLIS. I object.

Mr. GIBSON. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. ELLIS. The gentleman will not withdraw his objection.

ALEXANDER FRANCESCO, DECEASED.

On motion of Mr. WHEELER, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 1278) for the correction of the military record of Alexander Francesco, deceased, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MARY J. WEST.

Mr. CULLEN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, by unanimous consent, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. No. 455) granting an increase of pension to Mary J. West; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JUDGE EDWARD W. HILLYER.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, by unanimous consent, reported back, as a substitute for House bill No. 3198, a bill (H. R. No. 6019) to authorize the appointment of an additional judge for the judicial district of the United States for the State of Nevada; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EXTENSION OF THE HALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BOWMAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following order; which was read, and referred to the Select Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics:

Ordered, That the Select Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics consider and report upon the expediency and the possibility of removing the partitions between the Hall of the House and the lobby, so as to bring the Hall out into the sunshine and air.

PEMBINA-CHIPPEWA INDIANS.

Mr. DEERING, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 1885) to provide for the support and civilization of the Turtle Mountain band of Pembina-Chippewa Indians, and to extinguish their title to lands claimed by them in the Territory of Dakota; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

UTE RESERVATION, COLORADO.

Mr. HASKELL. Mr. Speaker, there is a bill upon the Speaker's table (S. No. 698) relating to lands in Colorado lately occupied by the Uncompahgre and White River Ute Indians, similar in character to one recently passed by the House, and I desire to ask this morning unanimous consent to have this Senate bill, which is a mere order to open the Ute reservation that was agreed to be done under a recent act of Congress, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs for its consideration, with power to report it back to the House for action at any subsequent time when the business of the House will permit. This is an important matter, and the Committee on Indian Affairs by this request are not asking leave to report at any time, which will conflict with the public business of the House, but would like to have the privilege of presenting the bill at some time when other business will not be interfered with, in order that this matter can receive the prompt attention of the House. It is a subject of so much importance to the citizens of Colorado that I hope there will be no objection to it. I ask for the reference of the bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs, with power to report back at any time.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I object.

TESTIMONY IN CONTESTED-ELECTION CASES.

Mr. PETTIBONE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Elections, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 5169) authorizing the commissioners of the circuit courts of the United States to take testimony in cases of contested elections of members of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES IN ARIZONA.

Mr. OURY. I ask unanimous consent at this time to introduce for immediate consideration a resolution with regard to the Indian hostilities in the Territory of Arizona.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas a hostile Indian outbreak has occurred in the Territory of Arizona within the last few weeks, and the citizens of that Territory are being day by day ruthlessly murdered by the Apache Indians, against whose attacks the people seem to have no adequate protection: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, requested to inform this House of the number of United States soldiers there are now in the Territory of Arizona, and whether the military force stationed in that Territory is sufficient to guarantee full protection to the people; and whether any legislation is necessary by Congress for the prompt and efficient security of the people against the destruction of life and property by hostile Indians.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3548) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

CHEROKEE INDIAN RESERVATION, ARKANSAS.

Mr. CRAVENS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 5544) to provide for the disposal of the Cherokee reservation in the State of Arkansas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DEBTS OF SOLDIERS AND RECRUITS.

Mr. SPAULDING, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 6020) to make certain debts incurred by soldiers and recruits a lien against their pay; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

KLAMATH INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. SPAULDING also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 60) for the restoration of the Klamath Indian reservation in the State of California to the public domain; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the amendments and report ordered to be printed.

MEXICAN POTTAWATOMIE INDIANS OF KANSAS.

Mr. SPAULDING also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1778, a bill (H. R. No. 6021) to provide for the final settlement with the Mexican Pottawatomie Indians of Kansas in accordance with certain treaty stipulations; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

J. L. BURCHARD.

Mr. AINSLIE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported, back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 64) for the relief of J. L. Burchard; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CALKINS. Let us now have the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the further consideration of the contested-election case of Lynch vs. Chalmers.

Mr. BRAGG. Does that come up on Friday?

The SPEAKER. It comes up on Friday or any other legislative day.

Mr. CALKINS. Before entering on the discussion of that case this morning allow me to say to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ATHERTON,] that I had assured this side of the House that a vote would be taken to-day, but owing to reasons which I think sufficient I believe now the House can make an agreement to have the vote taken to-morrow, the debate being closed to-day except the hour after the previous question is ordered. Will my friends on the other side consent to that?

Mr. ATHERTON. I understand what the gentleman from Indiana suggests is that the previous question is to be pending in the morning and the gentleman will have his hour to-morrow.

Mr. CALKINS. Yes, sir; and that the House shall adjourn to-night after the previous question has been moved; not ordered, but moved.

Mr. ATHERTON. We do not object to that.

Mr. CALKINS. I will say I have hurried the case on as much as I can and ask the House to bear with its management. I assure my friends on this side that the best is being done that can be done to have the case disposed of. I ask that the arrangement be made by order of the House as stated.

Mr. ATHERTON. There is no objection to that.

Mr. BROWNE. I desire to ask my colleague from Indiana a question. Does he propose that the House shall adjourn when the previous question has been moved? I will remind him that this is pensions night.

Mr. CALKINS. I am reminded by my friend that this is pensions night. I propose that the House shall take a recess after the previous question is moved so that it may consider pension cases at an evening session under the existing order of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the agreement to be that by unanimous consent, at the close of the discussion of this case to-day, the previous question is to be moved, and that the discussion shall then be considered as closed, except the last hour, to be occupied to-morrow.

Mr. RANDALL. If we are to take a recess at half past four o'clock I doubt whether sufficient time will be left for the consideration of this case.

Mr. CALKINS. The recess need not be taken at half past four; but let it be understood that the previous question shall be moved when the House takes a recess.

Mr. ROBESON. It is understood this order vacates taking the recess at half past four, and postpones it till the previous question is moved.

Mr. JOYCE. This order will not cut off the session for this evening.

Mr. CALKINS. Not at all.

Mr. DIBRELL. Before that is agreed to I ask unanimous consent to take up the first bill on the Private Calendar.

Mr. CALKINS. I will yield for that in a moment.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent the order for this evening, so far as it applies to taking a recess at half past four o'clock, could be vacated, and the session held to-night at whatever hour the recess may be taken. Is there objection to the proposed arrangement?

Mr. RANDALL. The House by a majority vote might adjourn, and that would cut off the evening session.

Mr. CALKINS. Of course if the House should decide to adjourn it might do so.

The SPEAKER. But under the existing order the House would have to take a recess at half past four o'clock. It is proposed that that part of the order shall be vacated.

Mr. RANDALL. That is not objected to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. RANDALL. And no other agreement is made.

Mr. DIBRELL. I ask to take the bill I have indicated from the Private Calendar for present consideration.

Mr. DWIGHT. I object until I understand what is being agreed to. I want to know what is the object of the evening session.

The SPEAKER. That is under a continuing order of the House that there shall be sessions on Friday evenings for the consideration of pension bills.

Mr. DWIGHT. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. DIBRELL. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar for consideration at this time House bill No. 1633, being the first bill on the Calendar, for the relief of certain citizens of Tennessee, of Bedford, Rutherford, and other counties.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill, but before concluding it,

Mr. KASSON said: I must object to this bill unless more information is given than appears to be contained in the bill. Before urging my objection I will ask from what committee this bill comes?

Mr. DIBRELL. It comes from the Committee on Claims and is recommended by Commissioner Raum.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. DIBRELL. I am sorry the gentleman objects. I must leave this city on Monday next, and I desire to have the bill considered before I leave.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill certainly cannot be well understood from this hasty reading. I desire to reserve the right to object at least until the report can be read.

Mr. CALKINS. I cannot consent to all this consumption of time.

Mr. DIBRELL. I ask that the letter of Commissioner Raum be read.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to considering the bill at this time.

Mr. DIBRELL. Then I ask unanimous consent that the letter of Commissioner Raum be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, February 18, 1882.

SIR: I am in receipt of the letter of the 8th instant from the Committee on Finance, United States Senate, inclosing a copy of Senate bill No. 1068, for the relief of certain citizens of Tennessee, addressed to you and by you referred to this office for report.

I have the honor to return the letter and inclosure with the following statement:

The bill is for the relief of certain citizens residing in Bedford, Rutherford, Warren, and Williamson Counties, Tennessee, who were assessed internal-revenue taxes, principally on income for the year 1863, prior to the formation of assessment divisions embracing the counties in which they resided.

With the exception of J. W. Wiggins and Isham R. Peebles, sr., and Isham R. Peebles, jr., the parties named in the bill have presented claims to this office for the refunding of the taxes claimed to have been paid. A claim in the name of Isham R. Peebles was presented, but it was not designated by either "senior" or "junior."

The taxes complained of with the exception of that paid by J. A. Blakemore were all assessed prior to the date of the issue of the regulations, special, No. 16, under the eighth paragraph of which it is claimed the taxes were erroneous.

Bills for the relief of these parties were introduced in the Forty-fourth and Forty-sixth Congresses. A copy of one of these bills, namely, H. R. No. 4819, Forty-sixth Congress, was recently inclosed to this office by Hon. Mr. PEELLE, sub-committee of the Committee on Claims, House of Representatives, with a request for information.

That bill, I think, was more equitable than any for the relief of the same parties introduced in the present Congress.

I have this day forwarded to you Mr. PEELLE's letter with a full report on the bill inclosed by him.

Respectfully,

GREEN B. RAUM,
Commissioner.

Hon. CHARLES J. FOLGER, Secretary of the Treasury.

ELECTION CONTEST—LYNCH VS. CHALMERS.

Mr. CALKINS. I now call the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the contested-election case of Lynch vs. Chalmers, from the sixth Congressional district of the State of Mississippi.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, it was not my purpose to address the House on this contested-election case, for the reason that as my own colleague from my own State was the party whose seat was contested I thought it better, upon consultation with him, to permit other gentlemen from other States, who would look upon this question of course from a different stand-point from that which I occupy to discuss the merits of the case so far as he was concerned. I had, therefore, understood that this discussion on this side of the House would be left to the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ATHERTON,] the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUSE,] and others. I did not desire to speak upon this case because I thought it extremely natural that the House would listen with some degree of allowance and probably some degree of caution to what might be said by the immediate colleagues of the gentleman whose seat is contested.

But the case has assumed an attitude different from that which ordinary election cases assume. A wider range has been given to debate than simply the consideration of the question as to what is the true method of settling this case.

I am not altogether unfamiliar, though, with the facts and circumstances attending this election, inasmuch as I am often in the district of my friend, General Chalmers, am familiar with its people, the county in which he resides having once belonged to my own Congressional district, when I was first elected to Congress, and the little property in the form of real estate which I own lying in that county. I am therefore thrown much in communication with the people of that county, and am not altogether unfamiliar with the general aspect of the case as it appeared in that election.

The idea, however, has been advanced, in the speech which was made by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOORE] a few days since, that inasmuch as there is a colored majority in that Congressional district and in the State of Mississippi, therefore the conclusion must be drawn that there was something illegal and improper in the conduct of that election.

Now, so far as the evidence in the record is concerned in reference to the proceedings in the county of Adams, and particularly to the proceedings at the precinct of Washington in that county, and at the precinct known as Dead Man's Bend in that county, I am somewhat familiar with it, for the reason that when proceedings were instituted in the United States courts against the holders of the elections in those precincts there was embraced in the indictment a number of gentlemen who were my friends, and among them were also embraced some colored officers of election.

Finding those gentlemen thus indicted, I volunteered my services for their defense in the United States court. I attended the trial of the causes, spoke in one case in common with a number of lawyers who were employed in the other cases. And after we had tried three of these cases out of the fifteen or twenty alleging irregularities and frauds in the elections in that county of Adams; after we had tried three of these cases before a mixed jury composed of seven white men and five colored men, after three verdicts of not guilty had been rendered, I suggested to the court from my place as an attorney in court that I hoped the honorable attorney for the Government was satisfied that his information against these citizens was not properly founded, and that the judge of the court would direct to be entered a nolle prosequi in the remainder of the cases. The judge declined to adopt that suggestion, but said he would allow the same jury to take the papers in the other cases, and the result was that there was a verdict of not guilty in every single one of the cases. Now, the proceedings in this election constitute one of the grounds upon which the contestant alleges that there was an unfair election in the county of Adams

I now come to the county of Warren, where 219 votes were thrown out under our statute law—a law, by the bye, that did not originate in Mississippi, but was copied from the Ohio law; a law similar to that which prevails in the State of Maine and in many other States of the Union; a law that has undergone construction by the courts in all of the States where such a law prevails. A similar law was adopted in Mississippi, copied almost in totidem verbis from the Ohio law.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Copied word for word.

Mr. HOOKER. As my friend from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] says, "word for word." This law was in force in Mississippi, and the unbroken current of authority with reference to a directory election law is that you are bound to construe it according to its plain import and terms; that, as with many of our revenue laws, the question of intention does not enter into the matter of its infraction, and a departure from it in any degree, however slight this departure, as all the authorities of all the courts in all the States have uniformly held, vitiates the ballot thus cast. The current of authorities is unbroken to this effect in every State where a similar law prevails.

The commissioners of election in the county of Warren, when they came to canvass the returns from the different precincts in that county, found these marked tickets in the box; they read the law; they looked to the adjudications of other States, and especially to the adjudication in the supreme court of Mississippi upon a similar election, and they felt constrained to cast out these votes.

Now, I wish to put it to every lawyer in the House whether it is not true that if the commissioners of election, acting under oath, as has been well said by the contestant, threw out these ballots, the onus, the burden of proof is upon the contestant to show that this action of the commissioners was in violation of law? Will the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Elections, my friend from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS,] deny that proposition? I take it he will not; and if it is true, then the real question to be decided, the very gravamen of this case, the very point in issue is whether the record shows by proper proof that these commissioners acted in violation of law in throwing out these ballots. If it is claimed that they did not act in conformity with the law, the burden of proof is upon the contestant to show aliunde that they did not do so; and this proof, I assert, is nowhere to be found in the record. That, then, is the very point of this case.

Thus much for the general aspect of this contested-election case. But it was asserted by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MOORE,] in the speech which he delivered the other day, that the methods of election in Mississippi were unfair and unjust in every particular, and especially did I understand him to assert that they were so in the elections which have recently occurred in that State. At the opening of the gentleman's speech, when the honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] proposed an adjournment, the gentleman from Tennessee objected to it and announced the fact that he had "some interesting reading," thus disclosing that whatever he had to say had been well considered; that it smelt of the oil of the mid-night lamp and was a deliberate, calm utterance of opinion on his part.

He began by delivering a lecture to the honorable gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber—his own party—in which he said:

> Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to the discussion of this case, with all deference and respect for the older and wiser members of our party who think differently, I wish now and here to enter my solemn protest against the shilly-shally, pig-and-puppy policy of our managers, if we have any on this side of the House.

I do not know, sir, which to admire most in these opening remarks of the honorable member from Tennessee, the sublimity of the sentiment to which he gives utterance, or the elegance of the diction in which he chooses to couch it. How this saddle-bag sentence in regard to "shilly-shally, pig-and-puppy policy" is to be distributed I must leave to honorable gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber to whom the epithets were applied.

I have never believed in discussing any question by epithets; and however widely I might differ from my friends on the other side, and however fiercely I might contend against them upon political questions, I should hesitate long before characterizing their conduct in the terms by which it has pleased the taste and the good manners of the honorable member from Tennessee to characterize them. Not only does he start out by giving a lecture to his own party, but he seems to have considered himself a sort of teacher from a politico-business point of view to my own State of Mississippi and the South generally. Let us see how far he possesses that grand prerequisite which every great moral and political lecturer ought to possess before he undertakes to become a public teacher. Let us see how far he understands the question, how far he comprehends the real history and subject-matter upon which he assumes to constitute himself a lecturer before the country. He says, among other things:

> I confess that I am, and I think the country is, growing very impatient with the milksop policy of our Republican majority here, and unless we decide soon to first seat the men who have been fairly and honestly elected, and then go on vigorously in the prosecution of the important public business for which we were sent here, I do not hesitate to say that the country will not do what it ought to do if it fails to repudiate our party at the very next election. A word to the wise is sufficient.
> Mr. Speaker, what I may say to-day shall be spoken from a business stand-point, and is intended to reach the business ear of the country.

The gentleman's business interests, as he tells us in a subsequent portion of his speech, make him familiar with the people of Mississippi, particularly in the sixth Congressional district. He says further:

> Following up this idea on the opening day of Congress I said: "In the interests of justice, in the interests of common fairness, in the interests of good government and the civilization of the nineteenth century, I respectfully and solemnly protest in the name of the American people against the administration of the oath of office to the Hon. James R. Chalmers, of the sixth district of Mississippi, to a seat in the Forty-seventh Congress of the United States."
> Mr. Speaker, I desire to impress upon this House, and especially upon the people of Mississippi and the nation, that I can have no personal motive of opposition to the occupancy of the contested seat by the honorable gentleman now in it; and am moved solely by a sense of duty and responsibility to the interests of my Government, and my oath of office to faithfully try and serve it.

Farther along in his speech the gentleman gives us another expression of opinion upon the same subject. He says:

> I will not undertake to speak to-day of the methods known more particularly as "the Mississippi plan," by which the State of Mississippi now sends a solid Democratic delegation to the Congress of the United States, because a discussion of this subject always angers Democrats, and I desire to avoid that.
> It is within the bounds of my own personal knowledge that there are business men in Mississippi, native and to the manner born, who vote regularly with the Bourbon party while secretly despising it, and who are led to do so only because the proscriptive and intolerant spirit of that "rule-or-ruin" party will not recognize the right of opposition, and because also that party teaches its adherents to obstruct in every possible way business transactions with a Republican.

Does the honorable gentleman from Tennessee mean to say to the House of Representatives that the men who constitute his business clientage in Mississippi are afraid to vote the Republican ticket and express the sentiments of a Republican?

Mr. MOORE. Will you let me answer before this House that question?

Mr. HOOKER. Yes, answer the question, but do not make a speech.

Mr. MOORE. I will only answer the question. Ask me the question again, so there may be no misunderstanding about it.

Mr. HOOKER. You said, and I will use your own language, as follows:

> It is within the bounds of my own personal knowledge that there are business men in Mississippi, native and to the manner born, who vote regularly with the Bourbon party while secretly despising it, and who are led to do so only because the proscriptive and intolerant spirit of that "rule-or-ruin" party will not recognize the right of opposition.

Mr. MOORE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to answer upon my personal responsibility as an honorable man, that a gentleman (and I think probably he knows him personally) who has for thirty or forty years been a merchant in Mississippi, told me during my campaign, looking all around to see if anybody was near who might hear him, said he: "Mr. Moore, I am a Republican in heart, but I cannot afford to say so living in Mississippi and selling goods. If I did, the people would not trade with me." I could mention that gentleman's name here, if I thought it was safe to do so. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANNING. He was trying to buy goods and ingratiate himself with you.

Mr. HOOKER. I undertake to say the gentleman from Tennessee not only is guilty of a mistake, but that he utters a slander upon the bold, honorable, and noble constituency which he presumes to represent here in his mercantile capacity.

Mr. MOORE. That is a mere question of opinion.

Mr. HOOKER. I undertake to assert there is not a man in Mississippi with a white skin who has not the courage, whatever political party he may belong to, to express his sentiments, but in this particular the contestant in this case sets an example to the men whom the gentleman from Tennessee mentions, and which the gentleman from Tennessee would do well to imitate. [Applause.] For he has spoken everywhere in Mississippi during the recent contest unmolested, untouched, with his colored skin on him, wherever he wanted to.

Ay, sir, the convention assembled last year at the capitol of Mississippi. On the senate side the Greenback party assembled and held its convention, and on the side of the house of representatives the Republican party assembled and held its convention. At night they joined their forces together and nominated a sore-head, Democratic, independent man for governor. In that meeting of the Republican party the honorable contestant in this case made a speech which was reported in the papers, and which has never been denied or controverted, but which stands on the record unchallenged to this day.

I call the attention of the Greenback men in the House of Representatives to this declaration, and I also call the attention of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee to it. I say to him that if a colored man could thus speak in the capital of the State, and deliver his opinions in the presence of his party, I cannot understand why any white man in Mississippi should secretly whisper into the ear of the gentleman from Tennessee that he was afraid to vote the Republican ticket. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He said in the course of that convention, speaking to his Republican friends——

A MEMBER. What are you quoting from?

Mr. HOOKER. I am quoting from the speech of Mr. Lynch, the contestant, as reported at that time and never contradicted.

> At the present time I think it unwise in us—

That is for Republicans, for this was a sort of saddle-bags convention, the "Greenbackers" settling in one end, and the Republicans in the other end, of the State capitol, and at night they were both fused together—

> At the present time I think it unwise in us to nominate a full Republican State ticket, but let us take advantage of these disaffected elements for this election, and I will assure you, my Republican friends, that so sure as the sun rises in the east and sets in the west we will at the next election be able to regain for the grand old Republican party that which we lost in 1875 by systematized fraud, plunder, and murder on the part of the Democrats of the State.

Surely, sir, if a colored man could thus speak in the capitol of Mississippi, and brand the people of Mississippi as he did brand them, there could be no white man within the clientage of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee who would not dare to express his opinions. In another portion of this speech the honorable gentleman alludes to the present governor of Mississippi, in which he says:

> The newly-elected governor of Mississippi makes in his recent inaugural address a plaintive appeal for immigrants to come in and build up the waste places of that naturally rich State.

Now I undertake to assert that the convention which assembled at Jackson, Mississippi, and nominated the present executive of that State, Governor Lowry, was one of the most intelligent and able conventions that has assembled for the last twenty years in that State. Governor Lowry was nominated and he made a canvass of the entire State; his opponent, the candidate of the Republicans and Greenbackers, canvassed the State with him, and I assert that in the whole of that canvass not a single bitter word was spoken, not an unkindly expression used, but a fair canvass of the State was made, a fair, honest election was had, and no disturbance or ill-feeling whatever occurred, except an unfortunate difficulty at Marion, in Lauderdale County, where the negroes assaulted the white people, and where two were killed, and afterwards another was killed in the sheriff's posse when he went to arrest the ringleaders. With that single exception there was not a disturbance in the whole State, and I assert this as true, and I challenge contradiction or denial of the assertion, that in the election in which my colleague, Mr. Chalmers, was elected, in which I was elected, and in which my colleagues now upon this floor were elected, not a single disturbance occurred at any point, or at any voting place in Mississippi.

Now, further along in this speech, which I will quote from, it is said by the gentleman from Tennessee that the old-line Whigs of Mississippi and the old Douglas Democrats were afraid to express their opinion or to declare their sentiment, because of the apprehension which existed, as he alleges, amongst them of violence from the Democrats, and yet here I demonstrated that this contestant, a colored man himself, speaking in the capitol of the State of Mississippi, addressing the white people of the State, dared to say what I have quoted from his speech; and if he could say that—a colored man amongst that people—is it reasonable to believe the assertion that the white people of that State were afraid to express their sentiments? I will say further, Mr. Speaker, for Governor Lowry, that during the canvass in that State he devoted himself to discussing the question of developing the material industries and the resources of the State, and that he stands to-day the type of the noblest manhood of the State, elected by some twenty or thirty thousand majority as the executive of the State; and that, as I have shown, during the whole canvass there was nothing but the fairest, open freedom of discussion between himself and his opponents.

But further along in the speech of this gentleman from Tennessee he says:

> The almost universal Democratic regard which has been suddenly and unexpectedly developed for the late President of the Republicans is, if sincere, greatly to be commended; and it is gratifying to see distinguished Democrats on this floor now quoting approvingly from his speeches.

And he finds cause for gratification in the subject, and he quotes from one of Mr. Garfield's speeches in this House the following language:

> So long as we live we will stand by these black allies. We will stand by them until the sun of liberty, fixed in the firmament of our Constitution, shall shine with equal ray upon every man, black or white, throughout the Union. In this there is all the beneficence of eternal justice, and by this we will stand forever.

So said I, sir, long before Mr. Garfield uttered that sentiment. I stood in my place on this floor when the first Presidential message came to Congress, when I was elected by my people to a seat here, and when it was proposed to take the ballot from the colored man in 1880, eight years from this date. When that President's message came here and that proposition was submitted to take that ballot from every colored man who could not read and write at that time, I rose here in my place, as I did everywhere in Mississippi, and entered an earnest, honest, solemn protest against the adoption of such a measure depriving them of the ballot.

It is true that the wisest men of the Republican party, such men as the late Senator Morton, of Indiana, in his speech delivered in Richmond, in that State, advocated the idea that the colored people, then recently emancipated, before being clothed with the rights and responsibilities and duties of citizenship, should go on probation for ten or fifteen years before these responsibilities should be thrown upon their shoulders. But the majority of his party decided otherwise. The colored people were invested with the ballot. They exercised it for some years. They began to understand the use of the ballot. They began to realize that the ballot meant self-protection, self-protection in common with the white people of the same country and equal protection with them. And I entered my solemn protest against the message of the President desiring to rob them of that protection.

I stood up as Mr. Garfield stood up in their behalf and protested against such a wrong; but I had not expected or apprehended that any Southern man with a white skin upon him would have made the innuendo which has been thrown out that the wreath of sorrow which enshrouded the whole country, North, South, East, and West was insincere in the breast of one single citizen of this country. When that great pall fell upon the nation a sorrow which reached from his own immediate family circle, bound to him by ties of blood and kindred, to the remotest States of the Union and the humblest citizen of the land, and everywhere a regret, a deep, profound, intense, all-absorbing regret for the damning act of his taking off was expressed, I assert, in contradiction of the innuendo of the gentleman from Tennessee, that nowhere through this land more earnestly and thoroughly was that sentiment entertained than in the Southern country.

This is the first insinuation that has ever been made by any man claiming to be an American citizen that the country was not sincere and honest in its expression of its regret for the death of the late President.

Again, sir, the gentleman from Tennessee, in the further progress of his remarks, violating a parliamentary rule upon the subject, I will not say violating good taste, in reference to a gentleman who was not present and could not reply to him, uses this expression:

> But permit me just here, Mr. Speaker, to express the opinion that in spite of all this the "Mississippi plan" has at length substantially run its course; and that this House has seen the last solid Bourbon delegation from that State that will ever be witnessed upon this floor. The better people, even of their own party, are becoming heartily disgusted and nauseated with these disgraceful doings; and evidences are daily accumulating of their earnest dissatisfaction with the home situation.

Further along he alludes to a distinguished Senator representing my State in the other end of the Capitol, Senator GEORGE, and says that Senator GEORGE was the author of what he calls the "Mississippi plan." Senator GEORGE is not here to speak for himself, but I am here to speak for him, and I intend to speak for him, and I say that a more lofty, a more noble, a more conservative-minded man does not hold his seat in the other end of the Capitol. He was the chairman of the State executive committee in 1875 and 1876 when we effected a revolution and achieved our freedom in Mississippi from carpet-bag rule and authority.

And I state here now, Mr. Speaker, in contravention of what has been said by the gentleman from Tennessee, that when the Department of Justice sent Hon. Mr. Chase, of Massachusetts, to Mississippi, General GEORGE was in daily conference with that gentleman, that he was in daily conference with the then carpet-bagger governor of Mississippi, and used every exertion that human foresight and human power could call into play in order to avoid that terrible and imminently threatening race conflict that was likely to occur any day. And the dispatches he sent were overhauled by the committee of investigation afterward, and found to show what I have asserted, that no man in Mississippi exercised more influence and exercised more control in that direction or in a more conservative spirit than General GEORGE.

What, then, was the condition of affairs existing at that time? The gentleman talks about the Mississippi plan and about there being no longer a solid Bourbon delegation from Mississippi. Does he want to go back to the reign of carpet-bag power in Mississippi, and would he like to import it into Tennessee, bring again the carpet-baggers and scalawags into power in his own State and in Mississippi, and restore the condition of government that existed in Mississippi from 1865 to 1875? What was that condition of government? Sir, the country has not been left at a loss to know what it was. I will not give my own assertion, but I will give the evidence of one of the leading men of the Republican party as to what was the condition of affairs in Mississippi in those days. I will give the testimony of a man who was afterward in the Cabinet of President Hayes, who held high position there. In order to show the condition of affairs in Mississippi, and to show who was responsible for that condition of affairs, I will send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read an extract from Mr. Schurz's speech in 1872, showing the then condition of the South. I ask the Clerk to read, commencing with that which is attached to the paper, an extract from a speech made by Mr. Schurz at Buffalo, New York, October 25, 1872.

The Clerk read as follows:

A blight has fallen over the South. It was not so much the war which was the cause of it as it is the shameful corruption which pervades the State governments. Fraud, plunder, shameless robbery—these are the characteristics of the Southern State governments. And who is responsible for it? Was it not Grant's administration to which all these plunderers clung for support? But how could these thieves keep themselves in power? Their most powerful aid was the Federal Government, and their next powerful aid they sought in the ignorant negro vote.

THE THIEVES AND THE NEGROES.

The thieves control these negroes, and it was under their influence that they have been arrayed against the whites. The blacks and the whites stand face to face as enemies, for the negroes are under the influence of the most villainous scoundrels that were ever allowed to disgrace a great and noble country.

The productive labor seems almost exhausted, the very foundations of society are undermined, the States are almost bankrupt. The Republican party is responsible for the present condition of the South. I have been fifteen years a steadfast, faithful worker in the ranks of the Republican party. I would be the last man to reproach the Republican party, with which my highest hopes have ever been identified. But this is a question of conscience.

Mr. HOOKER. The Clerk will please send the paper back and I will read the rest of it myself. It will be seen that that was the condition of affairs in Mississippi in 1872. Further along in the course of another speech made in the same year, in 1872, still further describing the condition of affairs in the South, and fixing the responsibility where he thought it belonged, Mr. Schurz says:

And thus it is—

This was a speech made at Syracuse, New York, in 1872, when the carpet-baggers and scalawags held Mississippi uncontrolled; when that beautiful condition of things existed which the gentleman from Tennessee would be delighted to see return, in order that there might not be what he calls a solid Bourbon delegation from Mississippi.

And thus it is—

that the great name, the great authority of the Republican party in its national capacity is being used this very moment to uphold the most atrocious system of government which this country ever saw. A party which cannot live and prosper unless it be supported by a revival of the old war feeling, and by tearing open again the wounds from which the people of the United States have bled so long, such a party when it has come to that does not deserve to live.

Another extract from a speech by the same gentleman made at Saint Louis, Missouri, sustains the same point:

CAN THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY BE TRUSTED?

Honest Republicans, are you still troubled by doubt? Do you still ask, "Will it be safe to trust them?" A journal of this city addressed the question to me, how the colored people of the South would be protected by legislation in consequence of this movement if the majority in Congress should change? I will answer. We had the same movement in this State; the majority in the Legislature did change; and how were the colored people of Missouri then protected by legislation? No legislation was needed to protect them. They were amply protected by the spirit of the people as it is issued from that movement. I remember the predictions that were made then to frighten us, that the "red-handed rebel" would rise up again in bloody ferocity and make it impossible for Union men and colored people to live in some parts of this State. Well, the people of Missouri were not frightened; they did trust, they "clasped hands over the bloody chasm" in 1870. Their trust was not in vain. The rebels were enfranchised. They became not only voters, but good citizens again; the rights even of the lowest among us were more secure and sacred than ever, and we have lived as friends and brothers since. Here it is history. Let the American people profit by the lesson.

I add the following extract from a speech by Mr. Schurz:

MILITARY RULE.

Let us look at the political developments of this country. We have become careless about the institutions of our country. You who have studied history know that in times of extraordinary urgency, in times of war, &c., we allow the Government extraordinary prerogatives which we would not allow the Government in ordinary times. You remember the Romans acted on this principle. When the enemy was before the gates of Rome they invested a consul as a dictator with supreme power. We did the same in the last war. The Government had extraordinary powers. Well, it saved the Republic. That was the chief end, and we all admit that it was accomplished. But during these times of war a bad habit is apt to spring up; the Government is apt to assume greater powers than it was invested with, and the people are apt to accustom themselves to the usurpation. When the war is over the Government ought to surrender these extraordinary prerogatives, which, though they may save the Republic in times of war, may destroy its liberty in times of peace. But what have we seen in this country? Military rule has been prolonged, and the country seems to be under the iron grasp of an all powerful and arbitrary ruler; and to restore the Constitution it may take the blood of thousands of people.

Now, it was against this order of things that the people of Mississippi felt it incumbent upon them to rise in 1875 and assert the right of self-government. The gentleman speaks of the Mississippi plan. Does he mean by that fraud, force, violence, and intimidation? If he does he might go back a little further in the history of parties and the country. From 1865, at the termination of the war, to 1875 the Republican party held the colored vote of the South in a grasp of iron. They ran them up to the polls like sheep in the shambles and voted them, and so long as they obeyed their behests and voted their ticket it was all very well. But when the colored man began to think for himself, speak for himself, act for himself, and vote for himself, you say, "Oh, this is a great outrage perpetrated on the colored man."

I assert, sir, on my honor as a Representative, that I have stood in the capital of my State, in the county of Hinds, for ten long years, and have seen the serried columns of the black voters, led by the "white scoundrels"—as Mr. Schurz terms them—who commanded them, march up to the polls, every man with a rifle or a shot-gun on his shoulder or a revolver buckled at his waist; for ten long years I have seen them march thus in the capital of my State to the sound of drum and fife, and everywhere else throughout the State. For ten years this was done. They talk about our people exhibiting impatience. Why, sir, you would not have allowed such a state of affairs to exist in the State of Massachusetts for two weeks. And as long as the colored men could be compacted together and voted for the Republican party we never heard any opposition to it. But now that they are beginning to be instructed, now that they are beginning to better their condition, now that they are beginning to acquire property, now that they are beginning to exercise the real rights of citizenship, you propose that they shall be deprived of the ballot; now you propose to say that because they exercise the right of suffrage according to their own judgment you will object to it.

Why, sir, these people are becoming now somewhat instructed as to their rights. Within five miles of my own plantation in the State of Mississippi there lives a colored man who is the owner of six hundred and forty acres of land, all paid for, and who has money in the bank. He is a Republican and votes the Republican ticket whenever he chooses. Many others of them are acquiring property in a greater or less degree.

I say here, in the presence of this House of Representatives, that when the charge is made that the colored man meets injustice, wrong, and outrage at the hands of the Southern people, he never finds anything like the outrage and injustice which he received at the hands of the carpet-bagger and the scalawag.

And when the gentleman quoted from a Southern newspaper a warning to the colored people as to the danger of a riot, I ask you why that warning was given? It was because they held in full remembrance the fact that in 1874, when the colored people were induced by the carpet-baggers and the scalawags, who always fled when danger came—when they were induced to march upon the city of Vicksburgh and assert what they considered to be the rights of the colored sheriff of that county, they were met and resisted and many lives were lost on both sides.

They remembered the terrible riot that occurred at Clinton, a year afterward, when three young men of that county were disemboweled, one of them in the presence of his family, by the enraged mob. They remembered that everywhere in Mississippi had been witnessed scenes of violence, bloodshed, and plunder during the whole carpet-bag rule of ten years.

And they know now that from 1875 down to the present time, with the exception of the single instance to which I have referred, at the voting precinct of Marion, in Lauderdale County, there has been peace and quiet, order and law-abiding citizenship, and the colored man has been entitled to full protection and representation everywhere.

It was said by the nominee of the Republican party for governor of the State of Mississippi, the man who was nominated by the Republicans and nominated by the Greenbackers, that they intended to have their rights; and if they could not get them under the "Campbell code," which was the last code of laws adopted in the State of Mississippi, they would have them under the "five-barrel code" of the revolver. That is the only sentiment of that sort that was ever uttered in that canvass, and it came from the candidate of the Republican party for governor.

Mr. MONEY. In his speech of acceptance after the nomination?

Mr. HOOKER. Yes; as my colleague reminds me, it was said by the candidate of the Republican party in his speech of acceptance after his nomination.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOORE] further along in his speech was pleased to allude, in violation of parliamentary usage and propriety, to my absent friend, the distinguished Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.] And he expressed the hope, his hope, that that distinguished Senator would be as conservative in the term for which he has just been re-elected by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi as he had been in the past, [Mr. MOORE rose,] or "words to that effect." I will quote you in totidem verbis from your own speech. That is the purport of what you said.

I can only say to the gentleman that he need not give himself any concern about that distinguished Senator. He is amply able to take care of himself, to be responsible, not to the politico-mercantile gentleman from the city of Memphis, but to the people of his own State, to the people of the South, and to the people of the whole Union

And just here, by the bye, I may remark as illustrative of the falsity of the position of the gentleman from Tennessee, that it is a remarkable fact, written in a letter by a colored man who is as black as his own coat, a member of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, elected from the county of Hinds, in which I reside, when Mr. LAMAR was a candidate for the United States Senatorship, although there was a regular nominee of the Republican party, that colored man voted for Mr. LAMAR. He wrote a letter afterward, saying:

I desire to say that I have done this because the people of this county have elected me to the Legislature of the State to represent my colored friends in this county in that Legislature, and I feel it due to the conservative character of Mr. LAMAR, his ability, his statesmanship, his widespread reputation, that he be returned to the United States Senate.

And I will say that Mr. LAMAR now comes back to the United States Senate with the vote of a colored man elected from Hinds County to the Legislature of the State of Mississippi.

So much, therefore, for this assertion that the colored men are necessarily to be voted by and attached to the Republican party. Further on the gentleman says that Mississippi was opposed to the education of the colored people. Now, the condition of the colored people in the South is not very well understood, and I think the gentleman from Tennessee does not very well understand it. There is in the South a condition of affairs with reference to the instruction of the colored people which I undertake to say does not exist in any States of the Union save those of the South. In many States of the North the colored people enjoy for educational purposes only that proportion of the educational fund which they themselves pay out of their own property for school purposes. But in every one of the Southern States the taxes raised for educational purposes are expended in proportion to the number of educable children, without reference to color.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman quote me correctly?

Mr. HOOKER. I will; I will put in the RECORD the extract from your speech. And I will remind you in this connection that you stand a monumental contradiction of your own statement; for, if I understand rightly, you have been an outspoken Republican for twenty years—ever since the Republican party was formed—unless you had some slight predilection to secession in the early part of the war. I do not know how that was. Did you? [Mr. MOORE made a gesture of dissent.] You did not. Very well; then you stand as a monument in contradiction to your own position.

Mr. MOORE. If you will allow me to answer—if I am not disturbing you——

Mr. HOOKER. I simply said I understood you had a proclivity toward secession. Is that so? You can answer yes or no.

Mr. MOORE. I will answer if you will let me.

Mr. HOOKER. At all events the gentleman is a Republican now, and has been a Republican for some time—an open one, I take it.

Mr. MOORE. I voted for Lincoln, and have always since been a Republican, and voted nothing but the Republican ticket. Casey Young said I was "the meanest Radical in America."

Mr. HOOKER. And yet, sir, "mean" as you are, and "mean" as Casey Young said you were, you owe the very food which keeps body and soul together, according to your own confession, to these very people in Mississippi whom you traduce.

Mr. MOORE. I traduce nobody.

Mr. HOOKER. You are a monument of the fact that they do not avoid a business man simply because he is a Republican. You say that people in Mississippi are afraid to say they vote the Republican ticket—afraid to talk in favor of Republicanism; yet they come all the way from Mississippi to the city of Memphis to deal with the most absolute, outspoken Republican in the State.

Now, I go back to the question of education; and I am not to be driven from the consideration of this question in its serious aspects. I assert here now that the best friend of the colored man on the continent of America—I care not from what State he comes—is the white man who was brought up in boyhood with the colored man. The colored people were born slaves without any fault of theirs, as we were born masters without any fault of ours. The war terminated that relation and made them citizens. We were all left in the same boat.

If we made a cheap government and a good government for the white man, were we not bound to make a cheap government and good government for the colored man? Does not the colored man now sit upon the jury? Is he not now a voter? Does he not now hold his property under the same laws as we hold ours. More than that, the extraordinary spectacle is presented to the civilized world of a people already rehabilitated and restored to their relations to the Federal Government, owning almost all the real and the larger portion of the personal taxable property, coming forward and voluntarily agreeing that this property shall all be taxed in common for the education of the children of the country without reference to color. I quote from the census tables to show the existence of this fact in various portions of the Southern States. In Virginia, for instance, there are 4,864 public schools, with a gain of 15,000 in attendance since last year. Virginia has a school population of 314,827 white and 240,980 colored. The value of her school property is $1,177,544. Her receipts from school taxes last year were $596,615. In North Carolina the schools cost last year $362,882, and there were instructed 136,481 white pupils and 89,125 colored pupils. Georgia, with a school population of 433,144, expended $471,000 for educational purposes. Alabama spent $367,093.59, and instructed 107,000 white children and 72,000 colored. Mississippi—much-abused Mississippi, which, as the gentleman said in the conclusion of his speech, is opposed to education, the State which he seems to have taken under his special charge to represent—spent $576,513.61 for the instruction of 112,894 white and 123,710 colored children, showing a majority of colored people of nearly 20,000 educated by the taxes levied upon the people of Mississippi.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman does not quote me correctly.

Mr. HOOKER. Let us see what you do say. You are speaking of the Democratic party, to which you want to pay especial attention; and you think Mississippi very Democratic—do you not?—you think it Bourbon.

They opposed the nationality of the country——

Mr. MOORE. That is, the Democratic party did.

Mr. HOOKER, (reading:)

They opposed the emancipation of the slaves; they opposed each and all the amendments to the Constitution; they opposed the suppression of the Ku Klux Klan; they opposed first the casting and then the counting of honest, legal votes; they opposed the suppression of polygamy and polygamists; they opposed first the substitution of the present wise for the pernicious old "wild-cat" system of money; and they are now opposing, with whatever bull-headed blindness and stolidity they can combine, all efforts to continue the wholesome existing system of national banking in the hope of reinstating the old and repudiated State-bank system, which rendered it necessary for every man to travel constantly with a counterfeit detector in his pocket. They opposed a national system of education for the ignorant, fearing that thereby the poor negroes might receive a passing proportional benefit.

Mr. MOORE. I spoke of the Democratic party.

Mr. MANNING. If it will not interrupt my colleague, [Mr. HOOKER,] I desire to suggest to him, in connection with the educational system of Mississippi, the fact that there are to-day about twenty-five hundred colored men and women teaching colored schools, appointed by Democratic superintendents of public education; and not $20,000 is realized from the taxable property of all the negroes of the entire State to keep up that system which it costs us annually over half a million dollars to maintain.

Mr. HOOKER. I thank my friend for the suggestion.

Mr. HORR. Right here, if the gentleman permits, I wish to ask for information, because I know his sincerity in this matter. Is it true that you treat Northern girls that go down there to teach Southern schools in a manner that renders it impossible for them to enjoy the society of the white people and remain among you?

Mr. HOOKER. No, sir.

Mr. HORR. Before you answer let me say this: a young lady I know well went to one of the villages in your State, and stated to me your native white people absolutely drove her from the State by the manner in which they treated her, and simply because she was a white woman teaching colored children. Is there anything of that kind down there?

Mr. HOOKER. No, sir.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Name the place.

Mr. HOOKER. I will answer by saying what I know. A young lady, whose residence is only two miles from my plantation in Mississippi, who was born and bred in Mississippi, reared in that State, upon Mississippi soil, taught a negro school and did not think she was degraded by it. They can go there and teach whatever sort of school they want to.

Mr. HORR. That does not answer my question. This girl was from the North, and she was a carpet-bagger. Was there anything of that kind?

Mr. HOOKER. I say no.

Mr. HORR. That is all right.

Mr. HOOKER. Allow me to say in answer to what the gentleman from Michigan has intimated and suggested by his inquiry, that the history of the South shows that is not so, and for good reasons. Before the war the most prominent men in my State were men who migrated from the North. Let me enumerate the men who came from that region. Since that time we have been desirous to encourage migration. White people are welcomed everywhere. They come to our country without a question about their politics. Before the war we evidenced how we esteemed our Northern brethren. Such men as Quitman, the gallant governor of that State and the chancellor of the supreme court, came from the Knickerbocker region of New York; such men as Montgomery and Boyd, the most distinguished lawyers we ever had in Mississippi, who lived and died in Natchez, came from the North; Prentiss himself came from the far-off town of Portland, in Maine, and commenced his career in Mississippi as a school-teacher. No man received higher honors or distinction from the time when he first went there than Mr. Prentiss. And so it has been. Almost all the men of distinction in Mississippi came from the North. Robert J. Walker and John D. Freeman and a host of others were Northern men. They came from the North, sir——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask that it be extended for a few minutes, so I may complete what I have to say.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not wish to interfere with the arrangement made to-day by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ATHERTON] and the House. With that gentleman's consent I should like to have the time of the gentleman from Mississippi extended.

Mr. MOORE. I hope the gentleman will be permitted to go on.

Mr. MANNING. What arrangement does the gentleman refer to.

Mr. CALKINS. The consent given to close debate to-night.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask that my time be extended fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman's time is extended.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield to me?

Mr. HOOKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. I wish to ask my distinguished friend a question. Allow me to read five or six lines from the authorized Democratic platform of Mississippi in 1877, and ask whether it is correctly reported.

Mr. HOOKER. I cannot give way for any reading, but I will for a question.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. I will ask a question, then.

Mr. HOOKER. I have only fifteen minutes.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. Just half a minute.

Mr. HOOKER. I object to the gentleman reading anything. He can ask me a question.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. Is it a fact in 1877 the Democratic platform of Mississippi declared that all independent office-seekers are inspired simply by a lust for office, and are to be regarded and treated in Mississippi as common enemies of the welfare of the people?

Mr. HOOKER. I think it is likely we had something of that sort in the platform. I have not read it recently. You had an independent candidate, "a Greenbacker" and of every possible variety of hue and color.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. And you treated them as public enemies.

Mr. HOOKER. They have not hung any of them that I have ever heard of.

Now, let me proceed. I show by this table from the Census Bureau that we educated more colored children by taxation of our property than white children. Here it is:

THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF THE SOUTH.

Virginia has now 4,864 public schools, and has gained 15,000 in attendance since last year. She has a school population of 314,827 white and 240,980 colored, and the value of her school property is $1,177,544.86. Her receipts from school taxes this year were $596,515.95. The North Carolina schools cost $352,882.65 last year, and instructed 136,481 white pupils and 89,125 colored ones. Georgia, with a school population of 433,444, expended $471,039.46. Alabama spent $307,093.59, and instructed 107,483 white and 72,007 colored children. Mississippi paid $576,503.61 for the instruction of her 112,894 white and 123,710 colored pupils. Louisiana spent $235,000 upon her school population, one-third colored, 226,709. West Virginia has a school revenue of $620,126.46 and a school attendance of 142,850, out of a school population of 213,441.

But now the gentleman from Tennessee wants no longer to have a Democratic representation from Mississippi. He wants to restore the Republican régime, to secure a carpet-bag representation, a scallawag representation from that State. And, Mr. Speaker, in this connection, let me give you a short history of the affairs in that State under the carpet-bag rule during the last five years of its existence there and a corresponding period under the Democratic rule. I read from a certified return by the auditor of public accounts. He shows that the total expenditures during the five years prior to 1876, the total expenditures, were $8,501,437.86, the average annual expenditure being $1,484,699.55. That was under the Republican, or carpet-bag rule. Now the total disbursements by auditor's warrants for the year 1876 under the Democratic rule was only $518,709.03 for that year, or a total within five years of $3,279,268.47 against an average annual expenditure of $1,484,699.55 expended under the Republican rule. The average expenditure under Radical rule for each of the five years prior to 1876 was $1,484,000, and the annual expenditures for the five years succeeding under the Democratic rule, for they came in in 1876, was only $655,853.69. I will print this table with my remarks in order to show that in changing the government the Radical government that Secretary Schurz denounced as the most corrupt that ever existed in the whole world, that we have lessened our State expenditures more than one-half; and in a period of five years have saved to the taxpayers of that State over $5,000,000.

FACTS AND FIGURES FOR THE PEOPLE.

ROOMS DEMOCRATIC CONFERENCE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,
Jackson, September 28, 1881.

The Democratic Conservative party promised the people of Mississippi to reform the abuses of corruption, extravagance, and heavy taxation that were the prominent features of Republican rule in this State.

The following statistics demonstrate the manner in which these promises have been fulfilled:

STATE DEBT.

The State debt on January 1, 1876, excluding common-school fund and Chickasaw school fund debts, and after crediting it with $424,388.21 cash in the treasury (treasurer's report for 1875, page 21) was	$1,047,409 04
On January 1, 1881, said debt, credited with $880,446.38 cash in the treasury, was	209,707 59

PUBLIC PRINTING.

The cost of public printing during Radical rule was thus shown by records of auditor's office:

In 1870	$53,505 32
In 1871	120,785 20
In 1872	69,791 82

In 1880	15,000 20
In 1881, appropriation	7,000 00
Total	87,814 12
The average annual cost of public printing during Radical rule was	74,137 62
And the average annual cost during Democratic administration was	14,635 69
Showing a difference in annual average cost in favor of Democratic administration of	59,501 93

LEGISLATIVE AND JUDICIARY EXPENSES.

In 1873 the expenses of the Legislature (auditor's report, 1873, page 196) was	153,425 29
In 1880 the expenses of this department were (auditor's warrants) reduced to	60,462 75
The judiciary expenses to the State in 1875 were	230,025 98
In 1880 the disbursements on account of the judiciary to the State were reduced to	78,165 40

The judiciary expense to the State in 1874 was more than $300,000; and 1875 is contrasted with 1880, because in 1875 a portion of the judiciary expenses were placed on the counties, as is substantially the case at present. Biennial sessions of the Legislature make the $60,462.75 the cost for two years.

TAXATION.

During Republican rule the taxes levied by the State and the various counties were onerous to the verge of confiscation.

In 1874 the State tax levied on property was 14 mills on the dollar. Of this, 4 mills were for schools, but none the less a State tax levied by the State government.

School tax, 4 mills, acts 1873, page 10.
General State tax, 6¼ mills, acts 1874, page 46.
Bond tax, 1½ mills, act March 28, 1874, section 8, pages 9 and 10.
Bond tax, 1 mill, code 1871, section 1663.
Bond tax, ¾ mill, act March 28, 1874, page 9, section 6.
Total State tax, 1874, 14 mills.

In 1875, the State tax was reduced to 9½ mills, of which 2 mills were for schools but none the less a tax levied by the State.

The State tax for 1875 was composed as follows:
General State tax, 4 mills, act March 1, 1875, sec. 6.
Bond tax, ¾ mill, act March 28, 1874, sec. 6, p. 9.
Bond tax, 1½ mills, act March 28, 1874, sec. 8, p. 9 and 10.
Bond tax, 1 mill, code 1871, sec. 1663.
State school tax, 2 mills, chapter 16, sec. 8, p. 43, Acts 1875.
Total State tax, 9½ mills.

The reduction from 14 to 9½ mills in 1875 was accomplished mainly by shifting certain judiciary expenses from the State to the counties. (Act March 3, 1875, sec. 6.) But the issue of auditor's warrants for 1875, was greater than in 1874.

From this 9½ mill tax, the Democratic Legislature reduced the State tax in 1880 to 3 mills.

And this enormous reduction to less than one-third the former levy has been accomplished without any injury to the public service and without impairing the usefulness of the educational and charitable institutions of the State.

It is said by some of the opponents of the Democratic party that though the State tax has been reduced, county taxes have increased and that State and county taxes combined are as high as under Republican rule. This is not the case.

The following table, prepared from official records in the auditor's office, shows the truth. This table shows the amount of taxes, State and county, levied in 1874 and 1880, the total of county tax being made up from the average tax levied by the counties, each year being averaged on the same principle:

FOR THE YEAR 1874.

Total amount State tax on property in 1874	$1,568,357 52
Total amount State teachers tax in 1874	627,342 98
	2,195,700 50
Total amount poll-tax	150,783 00
Aggregate county tax in 1874	2,101,598 30
Total tax levied in 1874	4,448,081 80

FOR THE YEAR 1880.

Total amount State tax on property in 1880	345,391 95
Aggregate county tax in 1880	1,474,823 36
Total amount poll-tax in 1880	176,177 00
Total tax levied in 1880	1,996,392 31

Many counties were burdened with debts under Radical rule, which had to be paid by taxation oth erwise there would have been a greater reduction of taxes.

A table of counties showing the per cent. of county levies, published by the Republican and Greenback committees, does not show an increase of taxation. Though the per cent. on the State tax is increased, yet the decrease of the latter makes the county tax less in 1880.

Thus, in Adams County, the State tax was 10 mills, with 4 mills for State school tax; the per cent. on State tax, say 10 mills, levied for the county, was 177. The State tax in 1880 was 3 mills and the county levy 633⅓ per cent. Thus, in 1874 the State and county tax in Adams was on $1,000 of property, $31.70. While in 1880, State and county tax on $1,000 was $22.

In order to present an illustration of the contrast, attention is called to the county of Hinds, the county levy being in fact made on 14 mill State tax.

In 1874 the State and county taxes levied in Hinds was $224,731.27. In 1880 the State and county taxes levied in Hinds County was $73,869.71, the reduction being $150,861.56.

And in this tax for 1880 was included $4,929.61 on account of N. J. & C. R. R. bond debt.

In an appendix will be seen a table of counties showing the actual total of State and county taxes for the year 1874 and 1880, compiled by Mr. C. F. Hemmingway from the records in the auditor's office and certified to by the auditor.

FORFEITED LANDS.

The distress inflicted upon taxpayers and the destruction of property interests were conspicuously disclosed by the wholesale condemnation of lands in the State.

In 1876, when the Democratic party came into power, the lands forfeited for taxes to the State amounted to 6,000,000 of acres.

This being equal to one-fifth of the entire area of the State of Mississippi.

At the present time, from estimates furnished by the auditor's office, the amount of these forfeited lands has been reduced to 3,000,000 of acres, and is being further rapidly diminished by sales and redemptions.

It is said by some of the opponents of the Democratic party that values have decreased, as shown by the assessments of 1874 or 1875 and 1879.

If there has been an actual decrease of values, it is only another argument in favor of Democratic administration, as notwithstanding that fact, the rate of taxation has been reduced.

There has not been during Democratic rule in this State anything to indicate that capital or property fears a Democratic administration, or that they have not had ample protection.

It is a fact that foreign capital is being invested in this State in lands and railroad enterprises. And it is very certain that this will not be checked by a continuation of Democratic administration.

THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

The year 1872 is selected as the year of largest attendance at the public schools during Radical rule. The records show for that year the average number of children in attendance to have been 125,000, and the expenditure for that year was $1,136,987.95.

In 1880 the average daily attendance of children at the public schools was 156,764. The expenditure for 1880 was $830,704.79. And proof that the colored children are getting a full share of the benefit of the public schools is found in the fact that of the 156,761, only 72,881 are white.

The number of teachers employed in 1872 was 4,800, and in 1880 this number was increased to 5,509; and of this number 2,314 are colored.

To further show the contrast between the former and present cost, the expenses of the office of State superintendent of education in 1872 were $6,523.31, and in 1880 was only $3,044.02. The salaries of county superintendents of education in 1872 were $47,741, and in 1880 were only $11,765.

These figures fairly show that greater educational benefits are provided and actually reach a larger number of children than under Radical rule, and at a greatly reduced cost.

This record deserves the approval of all fair minded people in the State, regardless of party affiliations.

It shows clearly some of the reasons why the Radical party was driven from power in 1875; and it demonstrates as forcibly why the administration of public affairs should not be taken from the hands of the Democratic-Conservative party.

The statistics in the above circular showing the expenses of the State government and the tax levies, are true and correct as shown by the official records of the auditor's office. And the statement showing "average" county taxes for 1874 and 1880 is a fair statement of said average.

Deputy Auditor.

SEPTEMBER 19, 1881.

I certify from the official collector's rolls in tax collector's office that the State and county taxes (not including polls) levied in Hinds County for 1874 were $224,731.27, and same in 1880, were $73,869.71.

L. F. CHILES.
Deputy Sheriff and Tax Collector, Hinds County.

SEPTEMBER 24, 1881.

I certify that the statement in regard to the amount of forfeited lands in 1876, and the estimated amount at present held for sale or redemption is true and correct, as shown by the land records in auditor's office.

AUDITOR'S CERTIFICATE.

I, S. Gwin, auditor of public accounts for the State of Mississippi, do hereby certify that the amounts set opposite the names of the several counties in the above statement show the total State and county tax upon each $1,000 assessed in each county severally, when the board of supervisors levied their percentage upon only 10 mills of the State tax for 1874, and where the levies were made upon the total State tax for 1880.

Given under my hand and seal of office, September 27, 1881.

Calhoun County showing an increased tax in 1880, is explained by the following certificates:

I certify the records in auditor's office show that 666⅔ of the 900 per cent. county levy in Calhoun County was on account of two Federal court judgments.

SEPTEMBER 28, 1881.

The judgments against Carroll County were rendered on county bonds issued in 1871. Nugent & McWillie, attorneys at law, were attorneys for the plaintiffs in the suits in Federal court at Oxford.

NUGENT & McWILLIE.

SEPTEMBER 28, 1881.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the face of these facts is it to be considered as a strange thing if the intelligent colored people of the State of Mississippi were not able to see and to recognize such a difference as this? I have stated everywhere to the colored people of that State that it was the products of labor that pay the taxes, that the man who raised ten bushels of corn and one bag of cotton paid his proportion of the general tax, because it was a tax upon his labor. I have stated to them everywhere that labor was money and that values were created by labor; that they were the result of the bone and the sinew and the blood and the brain and the muscle of the workingman, and that as the colored people were largely the laboring class that the taxes paid were to a great extent levied upon them and the results of their labor. Is it strange that when they were aware of the fact that we had reduced the taxes from 50 to 15 per cent., that when we showed that we had erected for the education of their children school-houses all over the State, which are magnificent in comparison with that in which I was taught, school-houses for the education of colored children, I say when we showed them this, is it wonderful that the race for one hundred years in contact with us, who have grown up with us, recognized us as their friends, should have rallied to the support of the men who had shown they did what they promised? Is it strange that they have at last come to realize the fact that what was for the benefit of the white man of the South was for the benefit of the negro, that what was cheap for the white man was cheap for the negro?

I think the honorable gentleman from Tennessee is misled by his zeal and misled by his partisan feelings to abuse the people who deal with him, and that he maligns them when he says that they are afraid to vote according to their conviction and dare not openly express their sentiments. And upon the question of Bourbon Democracy as contradistinguished from the ordinary Democracy I wish to say to him that I have never heard of it; and as to the question of the Vicksburgh Herald being unquestionably the leading Democratic paper of Mississippi, I take issue with the gentleman. It was once a paper of considerable importance, made so by the genius, skill, and energy of Hon. William H. McCardle; but I deny that it now speaks the sentiments of the people of Mississippi. I deny that the great public press, the Clarion of Jackson, the Republican of Brandon, the papers upon the sea-coast, the Hinds County Gazette, Port Gibson Reveille, Aberdeen Examiner, and other papers of that kind are not exponents of the sentiments of the people of Mississippi. But I deny also that in the ranks of the Democracy of Mississippi you can find the difference alleged by the gentleman from Tennessee. All are Democrats and they know no distinction between them. Some men and some of the newspapers may be a little extreme in the expression of their sentiments, but the gentleman from Tennessee must stand as a monument for all time for the characterization which he has seen proper to give to that people. I venture to assert that there are fair, liberal-minded men on that side of the House who will not subscribe to the sentiments expressed by that gentleman.

But my time is drawing to a close. I will do the gentleman from Tennessee the justice to attribute his gross misstatements, his absolute perversion of the real sentiments of the people of Mississippi, his perversion of the sentiments of the people with whom he trades and who deal with him—I say I will do him the justice to attribute all of his misstatements, all of his errors, all of his misrepresentations, to his ignorance rather than to his malignity. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to prolong this debate by any reply to the eloquent speech of the honorable gentleman from Mississippi, but am willing now to rest my case, having stated it fairly and truthfully, with the American people, to whose verdict all of us should be willing to bow.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, in the question which is now before the House for its consideration we have presented to us a contest for a seat upon this floor between a gentleman of the Caucasian race and one of the African; and I desire to call special attention to the fact that while this case has its precedent and there have been Africans on this floor as members of this House, they have all come from the South. There is not a case in which the earnest and enthusiastic Republican party of the North in their zeal for the equal rights of the African have ever even found a man of the African race whom they were willing to present for candidacy to a seat in this House. There is not a high office anywhere in any of the Northern States that I have ever heard of that was filled by an African. I venture to say that there is not a Legislature anywhere in the North that has more than one or two Africans in it. I heard lately of one being in the Ohio Legislature a year or two ago.

Mr. PEELLE. There is one in my State.

Mr. TUCKER. Only one?

Mr. PEELLE. In my State.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. We have none in Illinois.

Mr. TUCKER. Only one; hardly enough for seed. [Laughter.] I want to know why it is that gentlemen of the Republican party who hailed with enthusiastic applause on yesterday the advent of the contestant on this floor have never seen a man of the African race north of the Potomac that they held to be fit to take a place in this House. I asked a friend, now dead and gone to rest, some years ago, how that happened, and he said it happened in this way: that in the North, in all the districts and localities in which an election was to be had, there was a majority of white people. I asked him what difference that made; if the African was as fit as a white man to hold a seat on this floor why did not the white people elect him? You are very willing to say elect from the South the African to represent the Southern people in Congress, but there is not a district in the North, with all those white men impatient and ambitious for places on this floor, that presents an example of ever calling the poor African to represent them here. And when I asked my friend that question, and he said the reason was there was a majority of white people in all the districts and voting places north to elect white people instead of black, I said then, "You have got to accept one or the other horn of this dilemma, either the free-school system of education which you adopt in reference to the African in the north has utterly failed to raise the African to a grade which would enable him to rank with any man on this floor, or the system of slavery in the South existing until seventeen years ago is a better educator to statesmanship and positions of political eminence than even the free-school system of the North."

If this is not so you can only account for your not sending African representatives by saying that the white men at the North exclude the African because he is such, and give preference to the white man because he is a Caucasian.

Mr. Speaker, I do not complain that the contestant comes here as a member of the African race. If he is lawfully elected I would vote for him to take a place on this floor. But if he is not lawfully elected I beg gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber not to force upon a Southern constituency a man of African descent when they will not allow any of that race to occupy a seat here from any district of the North. Accord to the South what you claim for the North. I understand the presumption is made by gentlemen who argue the question on the other side of this House that whenever there is a majority of negro voters in any district of the South it is conclusive evidence that if a negro and a white man are running for Congress the negro is elected. Now, on what principle is this, unless it be that the Republican party claim an absolute ownership in those who were emancipated from bondage seventeen years ago? Why, Mr. Speaker, it has been the anxious desire of every thoughtful man from the South for these seventeen years past to see the race-line broken down and a division in which both races shall be divided upon questions and measures of public policy; and that has been done, signally done, in a number of the Southern States. It has been done in my own State. I am here to-day a Representative from my district by the votes in part of negroes in my district. There is no reason why there should not be a division on questions of public policy, why the race-line should not be broken down. But the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber hold that every colored man must absolutely be counted as a voter for the Republican ticket, no matter what else may be in issue to divide the colored race in giving their votes. This, sir, is a fatal error in the argument on the other side. The question is, Which of these parties has been elected by the sixth Congressional district of Mississippi? The argument on the other side is that Lynch has been elected, because there is a majority of negro voters there, and they must all have voted for him unless they were bulldozed or prevented from voting by fraud or violence. Why, sir, if that presumption is to prevail, then I suppose that whenever a colored man runs in any such district the verdict of the other side of the House would be without reference to the evidence that he was elected to a seat upon this floor.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another question which has been discussed here. One who had heard this discussion would suppose that the only places on this continent where there had been any of what is called bulldozing, or fraudulent voting, or stuffing of ballots, was in the Southern country; that that was the only district infected by these reprobated proceedings. I beg you, Mr. Speaker, to remember that the ballot itself is a shield which the law has interposed between the weak and ignorant against the powerful and the intelligent. The laboring classes in England and the laboring classes here are known to be so largely under the influences of capital that the old system of viva voce voting which we had in Virginia has been done away with all through the North and in England for the purpose of protecting the laboring classes against the influence and the power of wealth in controlling the votes of the masses. Is the South the only part of the country where there have been any evil influences brought to bear on the voters at an election? I remember some years ago, and it has been the case I believe almost as early as I can remember, that there have been just before an election a large number of employés put into the navy-yards in different parts of the country, and the laborers and employés in those navy-yards have been told by those who boss them that unless they voted this or that ticket they would lose their employment. Here, sir, (holding it up,) is a "tape-worm" ticket voted from one of the navy-yards in California. What is that for? It is a device, a mark that power puts upon its vassal to make him vote as it chooses. It is the means devised by governmental power to hold the voter under duress in casting his suffrage. Is not this a fraudulent use of coercion on the free will of the voter?

Why, sir, what is this whole thing of patronage? What do men mean who hold power at the other end of the Avenue, when if a man does not vote for the party in power his political or his official head falls from his body? Why, sir, in my own State, within twelve months past, a one-eyed Union soldier who was left for dead upon the battle-field of Vicksburgh, a good and earnest Republican, lost his official head because he refused to vote with the party in power. Aha! a free ballot and a fair count. [Laughter.]

Why, sir, do gentlemen mean to say that it is only in the South where power exerts itself to be wielded over ignorance and weakness? Do not gentlemen know, and will they not be candid enough to confess, that in the large manufacturing districts of the North the employés in large factories have to vote as the employer does, or they lose their employment?

Mr. HORR. It is not true in my country.

Mr. TUCKER. Yours is an exception, then.

Mr. CALKINS. Nor in mine.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I will state that a man in my own district was dismissed by his employer in 1880 for voting the Democratic ticket.

Mr. TUCKER. I am glad the matter is getting cured.

Mr. CALKINS. Allow me to say that in our country of all people the most sensitive, when you undertake to control their votes, are the workingmen.

Mr. TUCKER. Then why have you adopted the ballot in the North? Why not have viva voce voting?

Mr. CALKINS. You know, but I will not enter into a colloquy on that.

Mr. TUCKER. I want the gentleman to answer the question.

Mr. CALKINS. I will answer it in my own time.

Mr. TUCKER. Very well; I am sorry I cannot have the opportunity to reply.

Mr. CALKINS. You will have time to do so.

Mr. MILLER. I desire to say that it is not true as to my district, where more than eight thousand laboring-men are employed in the iron and coal business. That is all I have to say.

Mr. TUCKER. How do they vote?

Mr. MILLER. They vote just as they please.

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, on the Republican side, the high tariff side.

Mr. MILLER. Many of them are Democrats and many of them are Republicans; and the man who will dare to dictate their votes would have to leave the country.

Mr. TUCKER. I can only say that those employers in the districts which I seemed to have disturbed by my remarks are exceptional. I never knew anywhere—and I only mean to say that it is not less so in the North than in the South—I never knew anywhere that power did not seek to exert its influence at the polls over those whom it could control. Capital, which holds the wages of labor in its hand, will influence the laboring-man, and he will in a large degree yield to that influence, because his head may depend upon it.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I suppose the gentleman from Virginia does not take it for granted that because we do not get up here and interrupt him we therefore confess his statement to be true?

Mr. TUCKER. I understand. I do not believe my honorable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] or the other gentlemen who have denied my proposition have ever taken any part in this bulldozing influence.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Ah! there is more than that.

Mr. TUCKER. And I do not mean to say that they know contrary to their own statements; of course they do not.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. And we do know contrary to yours.

Mr. TUCKER. You do know contrary to mine? Is the gentleman then one of the employers?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. No; but I know what transpires pretty well there.

Mr. TUCKER. Oh, yes!

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I know better than the gentleman from Virginia possibly can.

Mr. TUCKER. I will not dispute with the gentleman as to our means of information; but I say, and I throw out the remark broadcast, that there never has been in the history of any country a system existing where there was a wealthy employer with hundreds or thousands of employés under his control who in some way or other did not bring to bear his own intelligence and his own influence upon the votes of those men when a question was raised that involved his interests.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. That may be all true, and it may not be an improper influence.

Mr. TUCKER. Oh, not improper. And I say it is not improper down here.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I am not disputing his proposition as to "down here" at all.

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, sir; or there either.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I simply rose to speak for Massachusetts, about which I know.

Mr. HORR. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] one question. Is he not familiar with this fact, that all over the North the Democratic party in every district, so far as my experience goes, gets the most of its votes right in the manufacturing portions of the district? Is not that true?

Mr. COBB. It is not true.

Mr. HORR. It is true in my district; it is true in my State.

Mr. TUCKER. I am not aware of that; but to the contrary.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The mass of the laboring-men belong to the Democratic party, and consequently they would naturally vote in that way.

Mr. HORR. Then, if we compel them to vote as we please, how do they vote the Democratic ticket?

Mr. TUCKER. I have only this to say: I understand it is perfectly true, and well understood, that a large mass of the laborers, of the employés in the iron and steel furnaces and foundries of Pennsylvania, vote for the Republican party and for high tariff. I have always understood, at least since the Presidential election of 1880, that one of the reasons we lost the State of Indiana was on account of the glass interest in one corner of that State; that within a month of the Presidential election the tariff issue was raised for the purpose of rousing the manufacturing districts of the North to vote against the Democratic candidate. How is this unless there is a oneness of feeling and opinion between the laboring-men employed in these manufactories and the manufacturer himself?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that he inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts whether General Butler stated the fact correctly when he charged that there was bulldozing of the laborers in the manufactories of Massachusetts?

Mr. REED. General Butler said no such thing.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I have said this much for the purpose of showing that in every country intelligence and property and power and all the influences that center about these three will be brought to bear upon those who are ignorant and those who are in what are called the middle and lower classes of society in all elections. Whether that election grows from intelligence or from anything else, it exists in the North, it exists in the South, and therefore gentlemen have no right to conclude, because a large part of the African vote in the South is now cast for the Democratic ticket that this is due to any impure or fraudulent influences. It is due only to those influences which are brought to bear in the North by the wealth and power and property of the North upon the operatives engaged in industrial establishments there.

Mr. Speaker, after these preliminary statements I come to discuss the real question presented here: Which of these two parties is entitled to a seat on this floor? I do not mean to say that we should guess at who might have been elected by the voters in that district; but looking as we are bound to look at that election, and the returns of that election, through the eyes which the law furnishes to us, who is entitled to a seat on this floor?

It will not do for gentlemen to say, for instance, that the 2,000 votes thrown out in Warren County ought to have been counted for Lynch because they were excluded, as gentlemen may say, upon a mere technicality. The law has thrown around elections, not only for the protection of the elective franchise in the voter, but for the protection of representation in this House, certain safeguards which have to be complied with, or the vote is illegal. As the law is a public one, and therefore every voter must be presumed to know what the law is, and what is necessary to make his vote valid, if he declines to use those guards which the law has thrown around the exercise of his right of suffrage, his vote must be excluded as not having been cast at all, because cast illegally. Now, let me take up the first case involving this question, because if that is decided in favor of General Chalmers there is no longer any question in regard to this contest.

If the 2,000 votes excluded by the commissioners of election in the county of Warren were properly excluded as illegal votes, then General Chalmers is unquestionably entitled to his seat. There is no dispute about that. The question then is, Did those 2,000 voters illegally cast their votes?

I have here, through the kindness of the chairman of the Committee on Elections, the original tickets voted in that election. Upon them there are certain dashes and marks besides the names of the parties voted for; and the question is whether those marks and dashes, or whatever else you may call them, make the ballot an illegal one. Let me look at the statute. It provides in section 137:

> All ballots shall be written or printed in black ink, with a space not less than one-fifth of an inch between each name, on plain white printing newspaper, not more than two and one-half nor less than two and one-fourth inches wide, without any device or mark by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another, except the words at the head of the ticket; but this shall not prohibit the erasure, correction, or insertion of any name by pencil mark or ink upon the face of the ballot; and a ticket different from that herein prescribed shall not be received or counted.

Gentlemen have said that most of these laws refer to the marks on the back of the ticket. Let me dispose of that question at once. Every inhibition in respect to these tickets applies to marks on the face of the ticket. The distances between the names, the marks or devices on the ticket, the erasures or corrections, have all reference to the face of the ticket; and the name at its head must necessarily be on the face of the ticket; so that the law proposes to inhibit these various marks or devices, or whatever else they may be called, on the face and not on the back of the ticket. There can be no question about that.

Gentlemen say that the marks on this ticket are very small—too small to have been noticed. Here, Mr. Speaker, the question is, How large they must be in order to be illegal? If these are too small to be noticed, how much larger must they be in order to be within the inhibition of the statute? As some one once remarked, a rat-hole in the dikes of Holland would let in the ocean. Where the statute inhibits a mark or device on the face of a ticket, the mode of construing the statute is to say it is mandatory—that there shall be no mark at all. But if the gentlemen say that the mark is too small, let me look at another aspect of the question:

> It is obvious that the name of the ticket at its head and the erasures and corrections of names on the ticket referred to in the statute must be on the face of the ticket.

It is obvious if these had not been excepted that the statute would have forbidden everything from being on the Democratic ticket but the names of the parties voted for and the name, as to the Republican ticket, or "The Democratic Ticket" at the head of one and "The Republican Ticket" at the head of the other would have been illegal.

It is also obvious that except for the exception contained in the statute the erasure of a name on either ticket by a mark being drawn through it would have been inhibited by the statute, because the statute says that no mark or device shall be put upon the ticket; but it then adds that this shall not prevent an erasure or correction of a name on a ticket. The erasure of a name on a ticket would have been within the inhibition of the statute if it had not been excepted. And what is that erasure? Merely passing the pen through the name, either pen or pencil. But this would not be as distinct a mark as those to be found on these tickets. Therefore, we have clearly from the words of the statute itself a rule for its interpretation. A mark as delicate as a mark for erasure on the ticket would have been within the inhibition of the statute if it had not been expressly excepted. Now, look at these tickets. There are on these tickets, first, under "Republican National Ticket," a very distinct mark; then, under the name of "Garfield" a very distinct mark and of a different character; then, under the name of "Arthur" another, and under the name of "Charles W. Clark" another. So there is on this ticket one, two, three, four marks other than the names of the parties; each one of which is more distinct and larger than a mere erasure of a name would have been.

What was the purpose of the statute in forbidding these marks? We see the meaning of the statute in the language of the distinguished author of the American book on elections, and I will read a passage for the purpose of showing the ground upon which I rely. Section 402 of McCrary on Elections states as follows:

SEC. 402. Where a statute prohibits the marking of ballots so that they may be distinguished by others than the voter, and declares such ballots void, there is good reason for construing such statute as mandatory. Such marks destroy the secrecy of the ballot, and it is well known that the plan of voting by ballot, instead of viva voce, was adopted for the very purpose of securing to every voter absolute secrecy if he desires it, and protecting him therein; and this was thought necessary in order to place the poor and dependent voter in a situation where he may act according to his own judgment, and without intimidation from the rich or powerful.

In Commonwealth vs. Woelper (supra) the supreme court of Pennsylvania said: "The engraving [on the ticket] might have several ill effects. In the first place, it might be perceived by the inspectors, even when the ticket was folded. This knowledge might possibly influence them in receiving or rejecting the vote. But in the next place it deprived those persons who did not vote the German tickets [which had an eagle on them] of that secrecy which the election by ballot was intended to secure. A man who gave in a ticket without an eagle was set down as anti German and exposed to the animosity of that party. Another objection is that these symbols of party increase that heat which it is desirable to assuage."

You will see that McCrary states the very reason upon which I have relied as the groundwork of the whole ballot system.

If these reasons apply to this statute of Mississippi, on what ground is it that gentlemen shall render that statute nugatory, null, and void, merely because they say these dashes and these marks were not sufficiently large to bring them within its prohibition?

But, sir, there was another reason, and I desire to call special attention to it, because it is stated as one of the reasons which led to the adoption of the statute, in one of the depositions to be found in the record, pages 36, 37, in Tinney's testimony; as follows:

Some of them printed in various colored inks, some with green backs, showing fields and game, and the picture of the candidate; others were printed with spread-eagles and flags, and various devices of that kind at the head of them. When distinguishing marks or devices of that kind were used on a ticket, imitations were frequently gotten up by the opposing candidate. When I speak of imitation tickets, I mean these sort of tickets—tickets bearing these marks or devices.

He speaks of that as the pre-existing evil which led to the enactment of the statute. They were marks by which one man might be deceived by another. You can readily see how that deception could be practiced. Suppose a colored man who was a Democrat was told by my Democratic friend before me, "Here is a Democratic ticket with certain marks on it by which you may know it." Suppose the Republicans found out the marks which were upon the Democratic ticket and would put the same marks upon the Republican ticket; and they would meet a Democratic voter and say, "We know you are a Democrat. You see this is the ticket." [The poor fellow cannot read.] "It is the ticket you are going to vote for." He would be deceived by the marks and vote the wrong ticket. The purpose of the statute, therefore, was to exclude every mark except the names on the ticket, so that the colored man or any other ignorant man who would see the ticket with no mark on it but the printed names (none of which he could read) would go to some friend in whom he could and did confide, and say, "I want to vote the Democratic ticket; tell me whether this is the ticket I want to vote." Then his friend would read out the names to him, which would assure him he was voting according to his purpose. But if there were marks on the ticket, such as he had been assured were peculiar to the Democratic ticket, he would vote on those marks without having the ticket read to him—marks put on the Republican ticket, the same as those on the Democratic ticket. The marks would mislead him. Their absence, if he could not read at all, would induce him to rely on the reading of the ticket as the guide to his intelligent exercise of suffrage. And so vice versa.

The purpose of the statute, therefore, was that the ignorant voter should be protected from being cheated into voting a ballot according to marks made upon it, and not according to the names of persons upon it for whom he desired to vote, which he would have read to him by some person in whom he had confidence.

Mr. HORR. That could not occur unless both sides marked their tickets.

Mr. TUCKER. That is true, but you will find that Lynch was anxious, as he states, that his tickets should be made like the Democratic tickets. The only object of this, if both had had the same marks on them, would seem to be in order that this deception could be practiced. I do not mean to charge that that was absolutely the case, but arguing from a legal stand-point the only object would seem to have been to create this possibility, and the very purpose of the statute was to prevent this, so that no voter should vote a ticket upon the mere marks upon it, by which he could distinguish it, but should rely only upon the names read to him by some friend in whom he had confidence. The purpose of the statute was to exclude every mark, not only every device upon the ticket, but every mark of any character by which the ticket might be distinguished otherwise than by the names printed or written upon it. This being the case we see at once that the existence of any marks upon the ticket is a substantial objection to its validity, and the statute which prohibited any marks upon the ballot was violated by every voter who voted the marked ticket.

But one of the most curious things in this report is the view the contestant has taken in this case, and which I desire to call special attention to, but before doing so I will call attention to another fact in connection with these ballots on page 49 of the record in this case. I find that Lynch says in his deposition:

Those dashes must have been on that proof then—

That is the proofs of the Miller printing office—

though if any one had asked me two minutes afterward I could not have answered. I have no recollection of having examined subsequently the proofs of the ticket printed at the Herald office, from the understanding that one proof was sufficient for both.

In other words, that at both offices the tickets were to be printed alike according to the proof he examined, and consequently with these marks upon them. This shows that all the tickets were designed to be uniform in having these marks on them fatal to their legality. Lynch continues:

The understanding was that the tickets were to be printed substantially alike in both offices.

So the purpose evidently was to have the same marks on each and all the tickets. Now, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen have said that there was no purpose in these marks, no fraudulent purpose. I do not desire to charge fraud upon anybody unless I know that fraud is intended, but it is a very curious thing that Lynch and Wright both state in the conversation about the tickets that Wright contracted that he would print the tickets so as to stand against all dispute, and he promised to defend them if disputed. Why, sir, if there was not a doubt in the mind of the parties at the time they were printing the tickets with marks, if it was not in their minds a question of doubtful legality, why did they talk about it? It was the Vicksburgh Herald man who afterward did defend the tickets. In other words, there was a talk between these men, that the tickets should be printed with marks, but so as to be just outside of the prohibition of the law, in order that they might be legal and yet used to their advantage; and this admission is sustained by the testimony in the record, as I have endeavored to show.

Now, I say, and I ask lawyers on the other side of the House if they can fail to agree with me, if these parties have tried as the testimony shows to see how close they could come to the boundary line between legal and illegal tickets by putting these marks upon them, that it is a violation of the statute, and that it is sufficient to invalidate them in the eye of the law?

Mr. HORR. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. HORR. Suppose the tickets had been printed, instead of in large-sized type that the Republican tickets had been printed in very small type, would that have been a violation of the statute?

Mr. TUCKER. I do not think it would.

Mr. HORR. Then that would have been a distinguishing device, and would they not have been able in that way to have recognized the tickets?

Mr. TUCKER. They might, but the statute does not prescribe the style or size of the type, but it does distinctly forbid distinguishing marks.

Mr. HASKELL. I want to ask my friend from Virginia what in his mind could be gained by the Republican candidate by having the tickets marked in that way? What advantage would there have been to Mr. Lynch in marking them?

Mr. TUCKER. I am arguing, if my friend will allow me, as to the purpose of the statute in excluding marks of all kinds from the tickets, lest the voter should rely upon certain marks rather than upon the names printed upon the ticket, the object being evidently to prevent the voter from being decoyed into voting against his principles by being imposed upon by designing persons and made to vote a ticket to which he is opposed.

Mr. HASKELL. But these were all Republican supporters of Lynch, and the marks were on the inside of the ticket, so that when it was folded it could not be seen or the marks recognized.

Mr. TUCKER. The gentleman here assumes the whole proposition. I will come to that directly. I was calling attention to the fact that the statute prohibited all marks of any character. Now, I understand it has been stated by witnesses here that some of the tickets cast for Mr. Chalmers were printed in the same way. That might have been the case, but it does not affect the argument. I mean to say that the reasons why distinguishing marks were excluded by the statute of Mississippi was lest those who were disposed to do so might mislead the ignorant voter; and hence if marks of a character which would indicate the ticket were printed upon them, they necessarily come within the prohibition of the statute.

Mr. Speaker, one of the queerest things in this record, as you will find on page 48, is the singular interpretation given by Mr. Lynch in his deposition, to the statute. After speaking of the Chalmers ticket, he says:

> This, it will be observed, has no rules, dashes, or punctuation. I invite—> particular attention to this ticket and shall maintain that the utter absence of all rules, dashes, and punctuation marks of all kinds is itself a device. This ticket is identified, &c.

That is to say, because Chalmers's tickets did not have these dashes and marks which were upon his tickets, he was going to maintain that the absence of these dashes, &c., was a device which would invalidate Chalmers's tickets. Now, Mr. Speaker, I put it to this House if the absence of marks upon Chalmers's tickets which were on Lynch's tickets was sufficient to invalidate Chalmers's tickets, when the absence of marks was not only provided for but enjoined by the statute. How can he escape the conclusion that the presence of those very marks, the absence of which he said would constitute a distinguishing device or mark—that the presence of those very marks, when they were prohibited by the statute, is itself a mark and device within the prohibitions of the statute? I repeat, Mr. Speaker, Lynch says that the absence of these marks is itself a device. Their absence cannot be a device within the prohibition of the statute, because the statute prohibits all marks and devices. Then, if the absence of these devices which is enjoined by the law was a sufficient distinction from his own to constitute a mark which he thinks is within the prohibition of the statute, of course their presence on his ticket when they are prohibited by the statute is a sufficient mark of distinction to bring them within the prohibition of the statute. There is no escaping the conclusion.

Mr. RANNEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. RANNEY. Suppose the Democratic ticket, instead of being printed without any punctuation marks at all, had had commas or semicolons distinguishing the names from each other, would that have been a violation of the statute?

Mr. TUCKER. I doubt whether it would have been.

Mr. RANNEY. What is the difference between one punctuation mark and another in this connection?

Mr. TUCKER. Ah! but this is not a punctuation mark. My learned friend from Massachusetts is very astute——

Mr. RANNEY. Is not a dash a punctuation mark?

Mr. TUCKER. I see what my learned friend is proposing. Upon my admission that a comma would not be a device or mark he would say these dashes would not be a device or mark; and then if I admit that, he would say, "Suppose they were made a little bigger, would they then be within the statute; and if not, then if made still a little bigger than that would they be?"

Mr. RANNEY. I would have the gentleman look at the Democratic tickets, on which, or on part of them, he will find the word "ticket" in large letters followed by a large exclamation point. Now I ask the gentleman what is the difference between a large screaming exclamation point as a mark and a dash when simply used for the legitimate purpose of printing?

Mr. TUCKER. I have not examined that. I did not notice the exclamation point. There was no objection made to those tickets that I have heard of.

Mr. RANNEY. The Democratic ticket has got a heading in large printed letters, and after it a large screaming exclamation point. What is the difference between them? The one is horizontal and the other is perpendicular.

Mr. TUCKER. I take the difference to be this: here is a name, "C. P. Nielson." There is a punctuation mark—a period—after each of the initial letters. That is the ordinary mode in which the initials of a name are kept apart in ordinary printing.

Mr. RANNEY. Without a punctuation mark, a comma or semicolon, it would be printed as one name, like an Indian name.

Mr. TUCKER. I say whenever any punctuation mark usual in printing is used, necessarily to indicate a distinction between two parts of a sentence, that would not be in my opinion a mark or edvice within the prohibition of the statute.

Mr. RANNEY. Suppose a dash is used simply as a mark separating the words?

Mr. TUCKER. But that is not the case here. I am not here to go into all the distinctions gentlemen may draw. I repeat, that the argument of the gentleman amounts to this: that if I admit that a punctuation point is not within the prohibition of the statute, then he will enlarge the point; and if I say that is not within the prohibition of the statute, then he will enlarge it still more; and the effect of that kind of construction of the statute would be to render it entirely nugatory. Therefore, I say the place to stop is on the threshold by asserting that where the statute commands that a ticket shall not have any mark upon it or any device, then if it has any mark upon it it is within the prohibition of the statute. I have argued this question thus far upon the mere reason of the rule. If I had been a judge on the bench, from the view I take of this case, I would have said as the supreme court of Mississippi said, that these ballots were prohibited by the statute.

Mr. HOOKER. Without the question of intention entering into it?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, without the question of intention entering into it at all; because the question is not whether the party had intended it. He must be presumed to have intended to violate the law where his act is a violation of the law.

Mr. RANNEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him one other question?

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. RANNEY. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he supposes the Legislature of Mississippi intended in passing that law to have printed such a ticket that an ignorant man who could not read would not know what it was?

Mr. CALKINS. Without getting somebody to read it for him.

Mr. RANNEY. Whether the law intended that an ignorant man should not know what his vote was?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANNEY. Does not the constitution of Mississippi permit an ignorant man who cannot read or write to vote?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANNEY. Then if he cannot read or write, how in the world is he going to tell his ticket?

Mr. TUCKER. Well, he could get somebody else to read it for him. I understand my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY] to maintain (in which I think he gives away his whole case) that these marks were put upon the ticket in order to enable the ignorant voter to know that he was voting the Lynch ticket. If so, then it was a fraud upon the ballot. In other words, I understand my friend to say that a man is not to be guided as to his vote by what is printed on the ticket, but by these very marks. Yet that is the very fraud which the Legislature intended to prohibit.

Mr. RANNEY. Will the gentleman permit me another question?

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. RANNEY. Is it not a special rule of law that every statute should have a reasonable construction?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANNEY. And that if a certain construction leads to an absurdity, that construction shall not be adopted?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, sir; and I say, with great deference to my learned friend, that I think the construction he proposes is, as I have shown, an absolute absurdity.

Mr. RANNEY. One word further.

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. RANNEY. Will you say that anything that is offered for a ballot, which contains only simple, ordinary printing, comes within the purview of that statute?

Mr. TUCKER. I say that any mark, which my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY] says is put upon a ballot to enable an ignorant voter to know what ticket he is voting without having it read to him, is a mark or device within the prohibition of the statute. Now, I take his confession as a confession that Mr. Chalmers should retain his seat. And I am very much obliged to my friend for having put the case so clearly, or enabling me to do so.

Now, I have argued this question upon the reason of the law. I say that if the secrecy of the ballot was destroyed, (for these marks could be seen through the ballot,) and any gentleman can see that such is the case if he will examine one of the tickets, and the testimony so shows, if the secrecy of the ballot was destroyed by the use of this class of ballots, then the reason of the law as well as its letter was absolutely violated.

Mr. RANNEY. Will the gentleman permit me one other question?

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. RANNEY. I would ask the gentleman if the object of the law was not to prevent an ignorant voter from knowing what his ballot was, but to compel him to ask somebody else to read it and tell him, how does that preserve the secrecy of the ballot?

Mr. TUCKER. It preserves the secrecy of the ballot from all that the voter does not want to know about it.

Mr. RANNEY. The supreme court says that the object of that was to preserve the secrecy of the ballot; yet the effect of it was to oblige the voter to disclose whom he intended to vote for.

Mr. TUCKER. My learned friend knows that in this case it is shown, as in every other under this ballot system, that a man very often comes up and votes an open ballot. Is that a void ballot? If he choose to disclose it, as I always do when I vote, that does not void the ballot. It is to conceal from anybody that the voter does not choose to admit to his confidence the way he is going to vote. But my friend says the ear-mark is to be put on the voter, and he is to vote as his employer says he shall vote or he is not to vote at all.

Now, as I have said, I have discussed this case merely upon the reason of law. How does it stand upon authority? I think the authorities sustain the views that I have taken. But if the authorities elsewhere do not, how is it in the State of Mississippi? In the case of these very ballots the question has been distinctly tried and has been adjudicated.

I call the attention of my learned friends on the other side of the House to this fact, which they will find by reference to the record of this judicial procedure, that the parties defendant demurred to the petition for a mandamus on two grounds, and those two grounds were the grounds which were decided by the court. It is true the court subsequently made a decision on another ground. The two grounds that were stated in the demurrer to the petition for a mandamus were the points that were first decided by the court. The third point was the point which the court raised itself, and said that they might have decided it upon that ground alone without going to the other.

Mr. CALKINS. Right at that point I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to one fact, that the demurrer confessed the facts stated in the bill.

Mr. TUCKER. Unquestionably; we all know that is the effect of a demurrer.

Mr. CALKINS. Before you pass from that argument perhaps you might want to notice it, and probably you had better.

Mr. TUCKER. Now, that there may be no difficulty between myself and the gentlemen on the other side, the writ of mandamus was finally refused, and the petitioner appealed. I read from the report of the majority, which gives the whole record in full:

> The writ of mandamus was issued, and the commissioners of election appeared and demurred to the petition on the following grounds:
> First. That they are merely ministerial officers, and have no power to reject ballots that have been counted by the inspectors.
> Second. That the marks on the ballots for which it is claimed they should be rejected are mere printers' dashes, and are not such distinguishing marks as were contemplated by the statute.

Now, the House will perceive that these are the two grounds which gentlemen on the other side take in reference to this statute. They were the grounds presented by the defendants for decision by the court; and the court in deciding that these dashes were within the prohibition of the statute decided a point which was expressly presented by the demurrer of the defendants.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CALKINS. Bearing in mind the suggestion of my friend from Kentucky, that the debate conclude to-day, I ask that the time of my friend from Virginia be extended.

Mr. CARLISLE. Whatever arrangement be made in regard to extension, we shall adhere to the arrangement made this morning, that debate close to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan.) How much time does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] ask that the gentleman from Virginia be allowed?

Mr. CALKINS. I ask that his time be extended indefinitely.

Mr. TUCKER. I will not abuse the patience of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. TUCKER. The House is aware that I have been put through a catechism by my learned friends on the other side of the Hall, and therefore my time has been consumed more rapidly than it would otherwise have been.

Mr. Speaker, a great deal has been said as to whether this decision of the supreme court of Mississippi was obiter dictum. Now, I apprehend no case can be found where a decision has been held to be obiter dictum if the point directly at issue by the pleadings has been decided by the court; and I have shown that upon the petition for this mandamus the answer of the respondents was a demurrer upon this very ground, that these dashes and marks upon the ticket did not bring it within the prohibition of the statute; and as that point was raised by the demurrer and decided by the court, how can it be said by any gentleman that it was obiter dictum?

But supposing it is not obiter dictum, gentlemen say that they are not bound to follow the decisions of the supreme court of the State. A great deal has been said about a long line of decisions. Into that learning I will not go, for it has been so fully dwelt upon by my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. ATHERTON] in opening this case that I should merely "gild refined gold" if I attempted to go into it.

But there are one or two general propositions which I desire to state. I hold it has never been decided by the Supreme Court, or any other court, that they would refuse to follow the decision of the State court, except where that decision was clearly wrong.

Mr. RANNEY. While the gentleman is speaking of the question of obiter dictum, I would like to hear his view (for I am seeking information) as to whether the court had jurisdiction. I call his attention to the language of the court, on page 9 of the report:

> The House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States is the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and the courts of the State have nothing to do with this matter.

Why, then, did the judge go on to decide the point? And if he did decide it, how does his decision bind us?

Mr. TUCKER. It needs no ghost to come from the grave to tell me what the supreme court of Mississippi said in that sentence. It could not have said anything else. The final right of decision upon an election case is unquestionably in this House; but the question that was brought to the consideration of the court, whether a mandamus should issue in that case to the commissioners of election, was unquestionably within their jurisdiction.

Mr. RANNEY. The gentleman will notice the language of the court: "The courts of the State have nothing to do with this matter." Hence, as I understand, the court does not undertake to decide the question in that case, but goes on to say in substance, "As there are criminal cases somewhere in the State that may possibly some time be tried, and in which the district attorney would like our opinion, therefore we express our opinion." I would like to know how that is a decision in this case—how the matter is within the jurisdiction of the court, and whether the opinion given by the court is not obiter dictum.

Mr. CALKINS. The very point being that if this board under the law was functus officio, then there was no proper party, and the court was without jurisdiction. Hence how could it pass on the question?

Mr. TUCKER. I admit that at the time the mandamus was sought to be brought to bear on the commissioners of election they were functi officio. But the question was whether that point and two other points were not raised by the demurrer; and I say that upon the points raised by the demurrer the court decided; and they decided that as the commissioners were functi officio there was no longer any ground upon which the court could give them any command to recanvass the vote. Still while this House is the judge of the election of its members the court of Mississippi had jurisdiction to command the commissioners of election under the State law to do their duty in making returns, &c. But while this is so, the court said it lost this jurisdiction when the commissioners were functi officio.

I admit that was right, but I say they decided the question raised by the respondent in their demurrer to the petition. Now, sir, unless this House is satisfied the decision of the supreme court of Mississippi was clearly wrong, all the reason of the rule which makes the Supreme Court of the United States follow the decisions of the supreme court of a State apply to this case. Here is a law which applies as well to elections to Congress as to elections for the State. Here is a question, therefore, which if it is decided one way here and decided another way in the State of Mississippi, as to State elections, would bring about that anomalous condition of things in which the same law would be interpreted differently in two classes of elections.

Mr. CARLISLE. At the same election?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, at the same election. The consequence is the reason upon which the Supreme Court have said they will follow the decision of the supreme court of the State prevails here, that the interpretation given by a State court in reference to what was exclusively within the jurisdiction of the State should be applied to those questions which are within the Federal jurisdiction. In other words, the Supreme Court say if A, who lives at Philadelphia, sues me in Virginia, and B, who lives in Virginia, sues me in Virginia in a State court, on like causes of action, the rule for decision on a State statute should be the same in both cases. If a contest arises in the State of Mississippi as to a State election and the supreme court of the State of Mississippi interprets the law in a particular way, does not the same incongruity arise if we interpret the statute of Mississippi differently from what the court of Mississippi interprets it?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say, therefore—and I find in the minority report that has been decided by this House again and again—that wherever there has been a decision in the State courts this House has followed it unless that decision was flagrantly an error. And, therefore, if this case is not clearly wrong there is no earthly reason why this House should seek to reverse it. And I say it is clearly right, and, therefore, with the supreme court decision of Mississippi in favor of Chalmers, and the reason of the law being in his favor, there is no ground except one I will not suspect the other side of the House to be guilty of—there is no ground for any departure from the interpretation of the Mississippi statute by the court of Mississippi and apply to Chalmers a different rule from that which would be applied to gentlemen contesting elections in the State of Mississippi.

But, Mr. Speaker, suppose this case as to Warren County were decided against us, there is another ground, and that is in this Issaquena County. Those returns were thrown out because they were not properly certified, and on what ground does the committee admit it. It is admitted the law of Mississippi has not been complied with in the returns being certified and signed by inspectors of election.

Mr. CARLISLE. That is not Issaquena County.

Mr. TUCKER. Very well; in reference to that it is admitted that there was an inherent defect in the returns made to the commissioners, and they were properly thrown out; but it is said that that defect in evidence is supplied by the certificate of the chancery clerk and by some other evidence in the case.

In reference to the evidence of the chancery clerk, it is not a deposition of the chancery clerk, but it is evidence aliunde. It is not the evidence of a witness sworn to testify, but it is the evidence of a man who certifies that certain papers are correct copies of other papers filed in the records of his court. I need not say to the lawyers of this House that a man who is not in custody of records to which he certifies has no right to make his certificate evidence of the truth of those records. How are these election returns in his custody? There is no provision of law which makes these returns go to the chancery clerk at all, and all he certifies is they were in his possession. How they got into his possession does not appear, and these returns he certifies to are without any other basis to stand on than he seems to have gotten possession of them, how nobody knows, but it is not such legal possession as gives him authority to prove them by his certificate. But it is said, and I understand that is admitted by the report of the majority of the committee, that standing on that alone they could not give this vote in Issaquena County to Lynch.

Mr. CALKINS. No, you could not.

Mr. TUCKER. You admit that?

Mr. CALKINS. Not on that certificate.

Mr. TUCKER. What else could you stand on? Upon what other?

Mr. CALKINS. Not standing alone.

Mr. TUCKER. Then my friend says, on neither leg could he stand alone, but upon both; when he could not stand on either, he could support it on both. Upon what principle? I suppose upon the principle that two negatives make an affirmative, and two nothings make something. Well, now, sir, I say that the idea of giving a man a title to a seat upon this floor upon two pieces of evidence, neither of which is legal——

Mr. CALKINS. Both are legal.

Mr. TUCKER. How legal? Had the chancery clerk the possession of the vouchers?

Mr. CALKINS. He says so.

Mr. TUCKER. Why, do I understand my learned friend, the chairman of the Committee on Elections, to say that if I choose to certify that Mr. Chalmers had 2,000 votes in a county in Mississippi, and that Mr. Lynch had only 1 vote, and that upon my own averment that I have the right to make that certificate, he will take that mere ipse dixit of mine as legal?

Mr. CALKINS. I do not like to take up the time of the House, because I know that other gentlemen wish to be heard in reference to this case; but I will say to the gentleman from Virginia, if he will permit me to interrupt him, that I do claim, by necessary inference under the law of Mississippi, that the circuit clerk is entitled to the possession of these papers by law. That, I hold, is a necessary inference of the law.

Mr. TUCKER. What law?

Mr. CALKINS. The code of 1880.

Mr. TUCKER. Will the gentleman refer me to the section?

Mr. CALKINS. I cannot go further now, but I will come to that when I have the floor. In this instance the circuit clerk and the chancery clerk are one and the same.

Mr. TUCKER. Where is the evidence of that fact?

Mr. CALKINS. It is a matter of public notoriety just as much as the fact is known that Mr. Lowry is the governor of Mississippi.

Mr. TUCKER. How is it, then, that the evidence is not sufficient? If the gentleman says this clerk is entitled to have the returns, why is it not ample evidence?

Mr. CALKINS. My friend knows the transcript of the custodian of the paper and the proper certificate prove that the papers are on file, and that is all the certificate proves. That gives a division of votes between the parties. The law says the commissioners shall certify the vote; one divides and the other certifies it, that is all.

Mr. TUCKER. The gentleman will find that the tally-sheets Griggs certifies to are copies and not originals. There is not one of these returns in this record that is original. These tallies are merely copies, as I say, and not originals. You have not an original tally-sheet. There is not an original return from Issaquena County which he certifies to at all. Therefore the certificate stands upon nothing but his own statement that he is entitled to make the certificate, and there is no law to prove it.

But, Mr. Speaker, I shall hurry on, because I know that other gentlemen will occupy the time of the House upon the other questions raised here.

Now, sir, there is something else that is relied upon as sustaining this Issaquena claim, and that is the report of the secretary of state; but you will find that the secretary of state says in the paper relied upon that he does not give the votes that were cast for each of the candidates at all. He only states the number of votes given at the polls; but as to the number for each of the candidates, they could not be correctly stated or ascertained.

Now, in reference to Bolivar County, I think there can be no difficulty; for there the votes that were thrown out, if, as is admitted by the majority of the Committee on Elections, they were properly thrown out, would give the election to Chalmers. And if this be so the result will be as I claim, although I may be wrong on the first two points. Now, the only ground upon which the votes of Bolivar County are sought to be counted is that the commissioners in their letter to the secretary of state appended to their return give the reasons for rejecting them and give the votes that were cast, Democratic and Republican.

But they do not pretend to state that these votes were all cast for either Mr. Chalmers or Mr. Lynch. They say there were so many votes for the Presidential candidate, but whether these votes were cast for the Democratic candidate for Congress or not they do not pretend to say; or whether the votes which were cast for the Republican ticket were cast for Lynch they do not state. In other words, they do not say how many votes were cast for Lynch or Chalmers. But then the gentleman insists upon it that the statement of the commissioners rejecting the vote, simply because they show how many votes were cast, is a certificate of the votes cast for the candidates. In other words, that the negation of the votes that were cast out is to be taken as evidence that they were properly cast. How can such a ground be taken?

I hurry to a conclusion, for this question will be discussed by other gentlemen, and upon these last two points more fully.

Now, I put it to my friends upon the other side of this Chamber, if we are to decide this case according to the law, if we are to count no votes but those which were legally cast, cast according to the statutory provisions of the law of Mississippi, how can you count the votes that were excluded in Warren County, that were excluded in Issaquena County, or that were excluded in Bolivar County, for the contestant? And if you exclude either one of them Chalmers is entitled to his seat. And how can you avoid that except on the supposition that these 2,000 votes would really, if they had been legally cast, have been cast for Lynch? We have no right to count any vote as cast for either of these parties that was not cast according to the law of Mississippi. Such a vote is no vote at all. We are not entitled to guess at what would have been the result of the election. We are here only to determine who was elected by the voters who were legally entitled to vote, and who voted as the law prescribed they should vote. Count those votes and General Chalmers is elected. And I ask on what ground is it that the Republican party of this House should exclude General Chalmers from his seat when, according to the law of the case, he is fully entitled to occupy it?

Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for their attention and submit the case as far as I am concerned.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1049) to promote the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service and to encourage the saving of life from shipwreck.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 5908) making an immediate appropriation for the removal of obstructions at Hell Gate, New York; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5352) to amend the laws with reference to elections in West Virginia.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 1609) making an appropriation for continuing the improvement at Charleston Harbor.

CONTESTED ELECTION—LYNCH VS. CHALMERS.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Speaker, in the examination of this case I shall endeavor to confine my remarks to a presentation of principles of law, upon which I conceive its settlement depends. These are legal questions rather than political, and depend upon the principles of constitutional rather than common law. In the discussion of them we should bring to our aid all that we feel of attachment to law as the great safeguard of our liberties and all that we have of knowledge of its great and governing principles. But we must be wise as well as learned; and we must not forget in the discussion of great principles that there is always a neutral region, where legal maxims melt into legal principles and where rules relax to admit the spirit of the law they are established to enforce. We should indeed be always careful when we tread along that uncertain country, and should endeavor to mark our course and direct our progress by the great ideas which lie at the foundation of the Government, which our action is intended to illustrate. Free government rests for its foundation on the free expression of the people's will. Elections are the accepted and legal methods through which that will is expressed and presented. The machinery of elections, the regulation of ballots and ballot-boxes, of officers, lists, and records, the certifications of inspectors, commissioners, and of governors, are the safeguards of the free and fair exercise of that will and the prima facie evidences of its expression and result. They furnish the prescribed and accepted primary evidences upon which, when uncontroverted, is determined the question whether at the election a majority of the qualified voters have cast their ballots for a qualified candidate. Unless the election is free it is no election, since it lacks its very essence. Unless it is controlled by the majority it does not fulfill the idea of representative government. Unless there are officers who may primarily determine who has received the majority there is no means of deciding in the first instance that vital question. Unless they have the power to judge and to certify we have no record of their decision. Unless this prima facie evidence, when controverted, is to be subjected to the great tests of legal judgment and human reason, then there is no use of higher courts to consider or superior tribunals to decide.

To preserve the purity of election, and to the end that the will of the authorized voter is not swallowed up and defeated by the action of illegal usurpers of his power, qualifications are provided by constitutional provision to limit and define the classes and the individuals in whom the elective power alone resides. By our Constitution it is provided that—

> The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

By the fifteenth amendment it is provided that—

> The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

These are the general qualifications fixed by the Constitution of the United States for the electors of Representatives in Congress. We turn to the State constitution of each State to determine the general qualifications of these electors by finding the general qualifications for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature; and those qualifications under the restriction of the fifteenth amendment make the qualifications of voters for Representatives in Congress, which no law of the State can add to or take away from by direct enactment or indirect provision.

Other clauses of the Constitution provide and fix the qualifications of the Representative. The spirit of our Government embodied in its general system and the provision of the Constitution which I have just cited unite to fix and declare the governing and essential principle that if a qualified Representative receives, at a constitutional election, a majority of qualified votes, he is entitled to his seat. These are the essential, governing, immovable, unassailable conditions upon which rest all constitutional elections. There is the seat provided by the Constitution; there is the qualified member; there is the majority of the qualified voters—the qualified Representative and the qualified majority give the seat. That is the end to be attained, and we only attain the end of free government and accomplish the free representation which our Constitution guarantees to the people when we put in the seat of the Representative the qualified man who has received a majority of qualified votes. These are the great legal pillars of the Constitution, the great foundation supports upon which rests the structure of our Government. They are thus the great objects to be reached. All else—and I hesitate not to declare it as a legal proposition which cannot be successfully disputed—all else is machinery for the accomplishment of these essential objects; all other provisions, whether State or national, are for the purpose of guaranteeing fair elections, surrounding them with proper safeguards, preserving and recording the evidence, providing for its proper attestation to afford the proper prima facie evidence of their fairness and result. The great essential conditions, if I have stated and characterized them properly, cannot be overthrown or swept away by the very means which are provided merely to preserve them. The spirit of the Constitution cannot be lost nor the requirements changed or modified by the legal and technical provisions made to record and illustrate them. Therefore, all the machinery which lies between these great landmarks is merely the machinery of evidence provided for the purpose of ascertaining and applying them and recording and proving the results of their application, and they are in their nature subject to attack and to be overthrown by other evidence. Since they are prima facie merely, they satisfy the requirements of the law when undisputed; they fulfill the law when, even though disputed, they are not overthrown. But when they are overthrown, it is our duty to disregard them and enforce the truth as otherwise established. If, in the light of other and better evidence, they are found wrongfully to deprive a member of his seat, the right of the member is not thereby lost, but he has a constitutional right to it notwithstanding, and it is the sworn constitutional duty of every man who composes the court that decides the question to consider and pass upon the evidence, and award the seat according to the result, upon his own judgment.

Let me repeat that proposition. The constitutional requirements are absolute; the qualifications are absolute. The necessity for a majority is absolute. The right of the elected man to his seat is absolute. But all the machinery which intervenes between the qualified candidate, elected by the qualified voters, and the constitutional seat is machinery for evidence only and is subject to be met and overthrown and destroyed, whether it be the result of force or of fraud, of intricacy or ignorance. Who denies that proposition? If any man can, I shall be glad to hear him. Let any who deny it take their stand fairly in the face of the Constitution of their country. These are the general principles. Now, how and by whom are they to be applied?

By the fifth section of the same Constitution it is provided "that each House of Congress shall be the judge of the election and returns and qualifications of its own members." That provision makes us the court for the maintenance and application of these principles. If gentlemen desire it, I readily admit that it makes us a court with the duties and only the powers of a court of largest jurisdiction and last resort. I admit that we are to "judge." But we are a court limited only as far as we are by express language limited at all by the word "judge" and the objects to which our judgment is to be directed. Still, we are a court, and, though a court, of last resort and of highest powers. A court of highest general powers known to the spirit of the law in the atmosphere of which we live is a court of original and natural equity; not a technical court of equity, such as in the progress of commercial transactions and business development binds itself to certain formal and technical and fixed rules and modes of evidence and proceeding, but an original court founded upon the broad principles of equity. And these are, says Blackstone, lex non exacte definet, sed arbitria boni viri permittet. Not what the law exactly defines, but what the judgment of good men permit. The Constitution creates the court, without limit of power except by the use of the word judge and the mention of the subject-matters to be judged of and determined.

By this action it clothed us with every power known to the spirit of our legal system, for the examination and determination of our questions, and left open to us without technical restraint every avenue for the investigation and establishment of truth.

We are a court, then, of high equity, proceeding according to legal processes to investigate truths, the conditions of which are defined and fixed by constitutional law, but untrammeled and unregulated in the order of our processes or the application of the principles by statute or organic law. We are the highest court on these subjects known to our organic law; to us an appeal lies from all other courts who have or assume jurisdiction of them; and for the settlement of them we have all the powers of all courts. In the exercise of these powers we may not make new principles of evidence, for we are to judge according to the logic of human reason and in the light of civilized knowledge, and these have accepted and fixed certain general sanctions of organized investigation which we may not disregard. But as we are left free by our own Constitution, so we are untrammeled by State laws or State machinery in the investigation of truth and in the application to the principles of evidence. We are not to make new principles, because those principles are a part of the common law established by the centuries of civilization, the fruits of which we enjoy and in the atmosphere of which we live. But we are a law unto ourselves when it comes for the application of the admitted principles of evidence, when it comes to the last text for the establishment of real truth and the actual carrying out of the requirements of the Constitution, whose creatures we are and whose principles we are organized to execute. I do not mean that it is not safer and better for this House, acting as a court, to ascertain the right and establish it if possible by means of the ordinary rules for the investigation of truth practiced in the ordinary courts and accepted by the common people of the country. I do not mean to deny that; but I do mean to say that when the truth is apparent or admitted we are not to be debarred from accepting it and establishing it by the intervention of mere technical rules of evidence or by the local decisions of rule-bound and inferior courts. Now, the governing fact of this case is established, as I understand it, by the admitted fact of a majority of 310 of qualified votes for John R. Lynch, found in the ballot-boxes and returned by the inspectors.

Now, since this is so, I trust my friends will not "stick in the bark" of this investigation, but will permit their views of this case to rise to the height of the great central idea for which the investigation is made, and that they will accept the fact that when the truth is evident or admitted the rules to ascertain it are "functus," and the imperative obligation is upon them to accept it and give to others their constitutional rights and exercise for themselves their constitutional duty.

What is evidence? Evidence is that which convinces the judgment of the court, that which makes truth appear to the tribunal to which it is presented, and when it appears or is admitted to a court which has the constitutional power to do it, that court has not only the power but the duty to disregard conditions which do not affect the substance, to sweep away technicalities, to break through trammels, to tread down formal rules, to accept the truth offered, and reach the very right of the case, and execute that with our power.

What I mean to express, and what is difficult of mere ordinary expression and clear understanding, clogged as we are by our common habit of ordinary and professional life, is that we must not fail to recognize the essential truth of the case, because the very means which have been erected to preserve and establish it stand between us and its light.

I can illustrate this best by a familiar fable. A simpleton in the Greek fable—and I would not of course apply that to my friends—a simpleton, as is told in the Greek fable, meeting a friend, said to him, "Why, I heard you were dead." "But," said his friend, "you see I live." "Oh," said the simpleton, "that cannot be according to the accepted rules of evidence, for you are not competent to bear testimony in your own behalf; and besides, I had the fact of your death from better authority than you are." [Laughter.]

That is just where we come to, my friends, when we attempt to limit things which are true by the means which we provide for ascertaining their truth. And that is exactly what we would do if we denied his seat to the man who had the admitted majority of votes cast at the election, merely because that majority was lost or eliminated in the processes of proof which are by State laws provided for its preservation and presentation. As I have said, the qualifications of voters are fixed by reference to State constitutions and defined by State decisions, unless these are clearly wrong, or absurd, or inconsistent with the requirements of the Constitution of the United States, or tend to defeat the very object of its provisions, or some of the provisions of the laws which the General Government has a right to make and has exercised its powers to make.

There is but one law that has been made on this subject by the law-making power of the United States. It is to be found in section 27 of the Revised Statutes:

> All votes for Representatives in Congress must be by written or printed ballot, and all votes received or recorded contrary to this section shall be of no effect.

In this case, then, we must appeal to the constitution of Mississippi to see who are qualified voters. We must also see that their votes when cast were by written or printed ballot, for the provision which was made to preserve the principle of voting by ballot, namely, the right of secret ballot if the voter chooses to claim and to exercise it. State laws may define the qualifications of voters; that power is given to the States under the Constitution. They may fix, where the laws of the United States have not fixed, "the time, place, and manner of holding elections." They may of course provide their machinery, their officers, and their modes of certifying and attestation, which shall be prima facie evidence, but they cannot impose either upon the voter any other qualification or upon this House any other than the constitutional limit of jurisdiction or any State rule of evidence or construction. No State can say to this House, either in words or in effect, "We fix certificates of attestation; we make them governing and final, and you, Representatives of the United States, in the exercise of your duty under the Constitution, must obey the limits which we fix upon the modes and manner and effect of proof." I say to learned gentlemen fix your own rules of proof; establish your own attestation; make out your primary case; if undisputed it will stand, but if brought to the test of controversy we will try it by those tests of investigation and decision which seem to us to be properly applicable to govern the case and elicit the actual truth.

Who gave to the State of Mississippi or any other State the right to limit the committees of this House in their investigation, or this House in its judgments by their technical rules of evidence, or by the weight which the decisions even of their highest courts give to it? If the qualifications of the electors and the qualifications of the elected and the actual majority are the great immovable and unassailable conditions—if all else is machinery, mere mode for preserving, certifying, attesting, and evidencing the results—then I say that, sitting as a court, in its highest sense, with all the powers of all courts, fixing our own rules for the application of legal principles of evidence, we have the right at all times and at all points to meet the suggestions of these prima facie certificates, their defects, their absence, or their falsity, by other proof, and by its force, if effective for that purpose, to correct, suppress, or overthrow them.

Mr. CARLISLE. As I am to follow the gentleman I would like to ask him a question in order to ascertain whether I understand his position. Does he maintain that because Congress in section 27 of the Revised Statutes has declared that all votes given for members of this House shall be by ballot it follows that any attempt upon the part of a State to prescribe the form of a ballot is null and void?

Mr. ROBESON. No; I have not said so. It is not necessary in this case that I should maintain that proposition. But if I chose to do so I could pile up in behalf of it decision after decision of the United States courts of this country from Story and Kent down to the distinguished jurists who now sit upon the bench. I could show that it is declared by Kent that when the United States enters upon the regulation of a subject over which it has control, (and it will not be denied that it has control if it chooses to exercise it over this question,) when it enters upon it and exercises that control by law that exercise of power is not only absolute but exclusive. But I am not now contending that in this case the United States has undertaken to occupy the whole of this field, and I quoted the statute only to show what United States law had fixed as the limit of its essential requirement on this subject, namely, the provision it fixes to secure the secrecy and independence of the ballot, and to say that, in my opinion, when it fixed that limit for that purpose, it occupied the ground of provision for that purpose, and that though other provisions for that purpose by the State might be lawful, yet these other and extra provisions would not be necessary conditions to the legality of a vote for a United States Representative.

Mr. MOULTON. Will the gentleman allow me a single moment? If that doctrine is true, then I would like to ask the gentleman this question: the Government of the United States, having made the law as provided in section 27, and having entered upon that subject, would it not follow that if any voter in any State simply has his ballot in writing or printing, without reference to size—whether it be that size or that [illustrating]—whether it be printed in all the colors of the rainbow, whether it has an eagle upon it or any other device, the voter would have the right to put it in the box and have it counted, anything in the laws of the State to the contrary notwithstanding? Is that the position of the gentleman?

Mr. ROBESON. I am not affirming that proposition exactly, but only the one I have carefully stated. If the vote were not received it would be difficult, perhaps impossible, to count it, but if the vote did not violate the United States provision to secure the secrecy of the ballot, and showed when offered nothing that authorized the inspector to refuse it, then it should stand against objection on that account. I am not saying the provision of the United States statute absolutely excludes the State from taking any other means which it may choose to identify ballots, to secure fair elections, if you please, and to ascertain the result, but I do say that when it appears to Congress that a qualified voter has cast a vote, if it be written with lead-pencil upon a piece of newspaper, Congress is not restrained by State laws imposing additional conditions or bound by any principles of right or justice to declare that by reason of the peculiar form of the ballot that qualified voter has not constitutionally exercised his constitutional right and that the qualified man whom that qualified vote would elect is not entitled to the seat which the Constitution gives him.

Mr. CARLISLE. Then he can vote at any place on any day he pleases, notwithstanding the law?

Mr. ROBESON. No, sir; I did not say that.

Mr. CARLISLE. Why not?

Mr. ROBESON. Because we give the State the right to fix the time and place in the absence of provision on our part. The time is fixed, the place is absolute, to provide an election; not mere provision for proof of it. I did not say the State could not fix an absolute time and place when we have expressly authorized them to do so. These are not like the regulations for the manner of holding, mere safeguard regulations to preserve, prove, and declare the result. I did not say that these provisions were not lawful. I did not say they were not permissible to the State, even obligatory perhaps on the State as a means of prima facie evidence and attestation. All that I say is, that so far as they are mere evidence regulations we may meet and overthrow them by other proof, and that we are bound to do so when that proof comes up to the point of proving that at a legal election prescribed under the statute a qualified voter has cast his independent ballot for a qualified member.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROBESON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. We are anxious to understand you.

Mr. ROBESON. Very well. I hope I make myself understood.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. You remarked a while ago each House was a law to itself. Now, if this House by the Constitution has the right to judge of the returns, qualifications, and election of its members, how are we governed even by a law of Congress that prescribes the ballot? Can Congress take away from this House its constitutional right under your mode of saying, we throw law to the dogs?

Mr. ROBESON. Because Congress has also the constitutional right and power to prescribe the time, place, and manner of holding the elections, and has, of course, the right to secure as a part of the manner (not of the evidence) the secrecy of the ballot by its provision.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Yes; but the Constitution says the State may until Congress changes it.

Mr. ROBESON. Well, I am arguing, or thought I was, that Congress has already changed it by passing a staute on that subject to the extent it thought it was necessary for that purpose, and that if the general principles of law should obtain, then by its exercise it excludes the essential binding force of all State action directed to that particular object. Not the right to make the additional provisions for other lawful purposes, perhaps even for that, but the right to make them effective conditions of the Constitution, which I have already said were that a majority of qualified votes should entitle to a seat. But I do not say, nor mean to say, that each House was "a law unto itself" in election cases; nor did I mean to enter upon that question, however inviting the field. I was merely declaring the general principles which should govern the application of the principles of testimony, as controlled by this House; and when I said each House was a law unto itself, I did not say, that unqualifiedly, or even generally; I said it was a law unto itself for the application of the common principles of evidence admitted or determined under law whose atmosphere we breathe, and the Constitution which created and controls us.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. How does this House get under the common law? What have we to do with the common law?

Mr. ROBESON. We are not under the common law, actually——

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. That is what you said.

Mr. ROBESON. Yes, I did; and perhaps I was not strictly accurate in my expression; but what I meant to say and what the gentleman understood me to say, I think, was that we live in the atmosphere of that common law which has come down to us from our ancestors, which is the outgrowth of the civilization we inherit, whose definitions we accept, whose spirit we are governed by, and whose organic principles we put in force through its accepted methods unless the very preservation of the principles demands that we should depart from the methods. Now, if these propositions which I have stated are true, even approximately—and I need not for the purposes of this case maintain them to the full extent in which gentlemen have sought to lead me, though my friends know that for myself I am always willing to accept the logical consequences of my own proposition as tests of their truth—then I advance to another controlling position in this case. It is admitted, I believe, that there were returned by the inspectors of election—the original officers who held the election in the sixth district, two-thirds of them admitted Democrats and all of them appointed by a Democratic governor—that the votes sent to the county commissioners by these returns, the returns of the very men who received the votes, there were between three and four hundred admitted majority for John R. Lynch.

Of the votes cast at this election there were returned by the men who received them at the ballot-box 310 majority for Lynch at the lowest calculation, 385 by another calculation, 635 by another, but 310 majority, throwing out all doubtful questions. But it seems that by one means or another, by one process or other known to the law of Mississippi, this 310 majority of votes, admitted to be qualified and returned by Democratic inspectors who received them for John R. Lynch, were lost. The very essence of the election lost in the means provided to preserve it. If that be true—and I believe it will not be disputed, since it was so declared in the contestant's appeal in chancery, sworn to by him, not denied by the contestee, proven before the committee and not denied, and the records in some form or other produced in proof from information—if that be true, what is there of essence that stands between that ballot-box with that admitted constitutional majority and the seat which John R. Lynch seeks? Nothing but the machinery of State laws, the chicanery of State politics, and the decisions of State courts. If the State court is, as I have said, debarred from declaring any new test for maintaining the secrecy of the ballot essential to its validity, and is confined in its purview to the question of qualification, which is left to the State by the Constitution, how can their decisions stand between? They themselves declare their want of jurisdiction. If they had it, for any purpose, it was lost in the form of the action, since the commissioners were functi officio. Their declarations and opinions were then clearly obiter dicta and of no binding force. And if they had binding force they did not declare the settled law of Mississippi, but were ex post facto to this case. And if theirs was a governing decision, in a case of which they had jurisdiction, then it is the very decision we are now reviewing, and we are of course not bound by it, since we are about the very business of affirming or reversing it.

Nothing stands between but the very machinery by which the State laws provide for ascertaining this very majority. The machinery provided for ascertaining and preserving the testimony which should show to us and to all men this admitted majority avails to destroy it. An admitted majority of qualified voters did cast those votes for Lynch. And will anybody say to me that when that fact appears and is admitted that the very machinery which is provided by law to show the fact shall be used to overthrow it? And that we, the court of last resort, with unrestricted power for the ascertainment of truth have not the remedy? In other words, that we shall not subject the prima facie evidence which the State provides to correction by other evidence, to be supplied where it is found defective, to be rectified where wrong, to be thrown out where fraudulent. Who denies to us this right as a principle of law? Why, if this be not so then our rights and liberties are so hedged round with technical defenses that the truth is lost in the intricacy of its own safeguards, and honesty and right have nothing to do but stand shivering outside.

Three hundred and ten at least qualified majority received by the inspectors of election at the ballot-box, two-thirds of the inspectors Democrats, and all appointed by a Democratic governor, and that majority by them returned to the county commissioners. If that be so, is not all that thrust between a mere contrivance and a fraud? Is it not all technically suggested, maintained, and defended to establish a constitutional wrong? Who shall deny it? And are the chosen defenders of the constitutional right bound or authorized to submit? Who shall give this proposition the sanction of his voice? Who shall maintain it by the solemnity of his vote?

But it may be said that some of the returns are defective. Let me, then, declare another principle of law which gentlemen will not dispute, namely, that the absolute right of the honest voter to have his vote counted when cast is never destroyed, when the fact can be proved by outside evidence, on account of defective returns of the election officials——

Mr. CARLISLE. Nobody contends that it can be; but it must be proved by competent evidence.

Mr. ROBESON. Undoubtedly it must be proved by competent evidence. But let me, then, declare another principle of law which may be important, and see if the gentleman will admit that, namely, that these men who by law are made custodians of official proceedings are competent to certify to the papers and facts in their custody, and that their certificates are competent testimony even in courts of law, without an express statute to make them so.

Mr. CARLISLE. You mean the officers of election may certify.

Mr. ROBESON. I mean the custodians of public papers.

Mr. CARLISLE. The legal custodians.

Mr. ROBESON. The legal custodians of public papers.

Mr. CARLISLE. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. ROBESON. I ask the gentleman that question, because I admit the old law was somewhat difficult to understand upon that point, since it was often held that to make their certificates evidence required a statute, not only making their attestation evidence, but a statute authorizing them to attest; but I say by the law of the country as it now obtains, declared by the Supreme Court and admitted on all hands, it is now accepted that the attestation and certification of the legal custodians of public matters is competent evidence. I do not say conclusive, but competent evidence, though of course liable to be disputed or overthrown by other testimony.

Now, if what I have argued be true there is only one other suggestion of difficulty between John R. Lynch's election and his seat as a member of this House. The supreme court of Mississippi have declared that some 2,000 of these votes were illegal because they had upon their face some printers' dashes, and these distinguishing marks they hold to be against the statute. Suppose the supreme court of Mississippi had jurisdiction, which they themselves say they had not, how could its decision bind us in this case? These provisions are neither essential to the honesty of the vote or the principle of a secret ballot. Suppose the Legislature of Mississippi had passed a law that no ballot should be legal unless it had printed on its face a disavowal of the Government of the United States, would not that have been a thing for us to disregard? I think so. Suppose that the Legislature should pass a law requiring some other not seditious but ridiculous condition for the ballots? I pass now from the region of unlawful requirements and suggest that the Legislature should provide some ridiculous requirements. Suppose it had required to have printed on the face of the ballots some ridiculous or absurd or useless or unessential qualifications to the vote. These commissioners might have thrown it out. This court might have declared that the statute was binding upon them and sustained them in that act, but would that have any binding force upon this court, and deprive an honest voter of his right and an elected Representative of his seat? It would have been a decision of the supreme court of Mississippi, but it would not have been binding upon us. Why? Because it does not strike at the only essential question which their State and its courts are authorized to control, namely, the qualifications of the lawful elector. I give you that as an illustration of the truth of my proposition, which seemed to trouble the gentlemen upon the other side, but the contrary of which will be found to be absurd by every fair test.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Will the gentleman from New Jersey allow me a question?

Mr. ROBESON. Of course.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Speaking of this matter of the regulation of the ballot by State laws, and the power residing with Congress to alter or annul any regulation made by a State; now, if a State chooses to make that regulation, no matter how absurd, it being within our power to correct it by statutory provision, would we not be bound to it by acquiescence?

Mr. ROBESON. We certainly would not in this case, for we have had no chance to correct it. We are engaged in correcting it now.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Certainly since this act was passed Congress has had an opportunity to correct it; and by not doing so we have acquiesced in it. If we had thought it absurd we would have corrected it. The Constitution provides for that; otherwise a State, or several States combined, could prevent an election.

Mr. ROBESON. I hope the gentleman from New York will understand my proposition. It is this. I will repeat it again: there are certain things that are essential, in the face of which we cannot seat a man though he has the majority of the lawful votes, but in the absence of which we are not controlled by the requirements of technical statutes nor governed by technical rules of evidence in arriving at the fact as to whether he has received the majority of the lawful votes or not. Besides this, I hold that for the purpose of maintaining the secrecy of the ballot Congress has acted, and the State power over the character of the ballot for that purpose is gone. True, the qualification of the elector remains to the State, as a matter to be fixed by the State constitution and laws, and perhaps, for illustration, by the State courts if they are not palpably wrong; but what other essential condition is left for the State? The constitutional right to his seat of the qualified Representative, if he has the constitutional majority of qualified voters, is the essential thing, but a right independent of State law. All, besides what I have mentioned, is the machinery of evidence, of malregulation, call it directory if you wish, a legal term to characterize it, but which fades away before the sunlight of truth and hides its diminished head when confronted with absolute right. And that is the very reason why we are constituted without limitation the judges of the elections, qualifications, and returns of our own members, and why it is left to no other tribunal.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Now, if the gentleman will allow me to ask him a question here, because this is the very gist of this matter——

The SPEAKER pro tempore, [Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan.] Does the gentleman from New Jersey yield?

Mr. ROBESON. I am willing to answer all questions, but the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] is to follow me and I feel that I am occupying his time.

Mr. HUTCHINS. We will sit long enough to understand this thing.

Mr. ROBESON. I have no objection to hearing the gentleman's question except that I think common courtesy to my friend from Kentucky obliged me to say what I have said.

Mr. HUTCHINS. The Constitution provides that the States shall prescribe the manner of an election. Congress has passed an act by which they have provided it shall be by ballot, so far as the manner is concerned. They leave with the States the form of the ballot, and every State in the Union, without exception, or nearly every State—I think every State—has prescribed that form. Now, in the absence of an act of Congress, no matter however absurd this provision by a State may be, Congress having the power to change it—in the absence of an act of Congress upon that subject why are we not bound by the constitutional provision which leaves it within the power of the State to prescribe the manner? That is the point I want to get at. If a State says the ballots shall be of equal size and Congress acquiesces in that, and the Constitution says the State may prescribe the manner, what right have we to overrule the State unless we have a right to overrule the Constitution?

Mr. ROBESON. I started with the proposition, which is the answer that I give to the gentleman, that, given the fixed point from which we must start, namely, the constitutional majority, and the point which we must reach, namely, the constitutional seat, all else is mere regulation or evidence which we may overcome by other evidence if it be not correct.

Mr. HUTCHINS. The gentleman from New Jersey will not understand me——

Mr. ROBESON. I understand the gentleman thoroughly. I think——

Mr. HUTCHINS. The statute says the ballot shall be printed in a particular manner. How do you escape that?

Mr. ROBESON. I said before, and I say again, that if it appears to this Congress that an honest voter, qualified to vote, has cast his vote in favor of a qualified candidate and that vote elects him, it is the sworn duty of this House, State provision or State laws to the contrary notwithstanding, to put him in his seat.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Then my friend takes the ground——

Mr. ROBESON. Yes, sir; I take that ground and all that it implies.

Mr. HUTCHINS. He takes the ground that although the Constitution provides that the manner of holding an election may be prescribed by a State, if he does not think the manner prescribed is a correct one or one that ought to be observed, then he is the high court over all constitutional law who is to decide.

Mr. ROBESON. Not I, but the Congress of the United States, which the Constitution has made the highest constitutional court in this matter.

Mr. HUTCHINS. That is to say, the Congress of the United States is not to be governed by a provision in the Constitution. That is what the gentleman proclaims.

Mr. ROBESON. All right, if the gentleman thinks that is the result of what I have to say. I do not so think. What I say is this: that the "time, place, and manner of holding" may, as the law now stands, be fixed by the State; that the time is absolute and the place is absolute, but that the regulations as to "manner" are mere regulations of safeguard and evidence to provide the means for ascertaining the result and providing and preserving the evidence of it, to the end that the essential fact of a constitutional majority may have its legitimate, essential end and result, namely, the constitutional seat; that to make the latter surely result from the former is the purpose and object of all these regulations as to "manner," and that as regulations they are in their character regulations to make and preserve evidence, directory only in their provisions and prima facie in their result, and liable to be corrected, supplied, or contradicted by other evidence, to the end that the very result that they are provided to preserve and prove may not be lost in the regulations provided to preserve and prove it. I trust that is clearly stated. I can do no better. If I have failed the fault is in me, not in my proposition.

Two questions only remain, which may be objects of regulation by the State: first, the general regulations to preserve the secrecy of the ballot. If these be in their nature essential, which I do not admit, it cannot be denied that this particular object has been contemplated and provided for by the United States itself, and that to that extent and for that purpose section 27 of the Revised Statutes is exclusive. But, second, the State may fix the qualifications of voters. It has done so, and if the action of the supreme court of the States has any foundation at all it must be put on the ground that this ballot is a test of and fixes the qualifications of voters.

The supreme court of Mississippi has thrown out more than 2,000 of these votes given for Mr. Lynch—because they say that the printers' dashes after the heading and between the names are distinguishing marks within the meaning of the statute; but they have not thrown out any of these ballots, though the vote of a whole county was cast for Mr. Chalmers in this form:

Democratic-Conservative

TICKET!

For President,

For Member of the House of Representatives from the 6th Congressional District.

JAMES R. CHALMERS.

Look at the heading in capitals and the "screaming" exclamation point after the word "TICKET." Which has the most distinguishing mark on it? It is a mark that may distinguish the ballot, but it will never distinguish the court.

Mr. CARLISLE. Does the gentleman not know it to be a fact that a whole county voted for Lynch on the other ticket and was counted?

Mr. ROBESON. I do not care as to that. I do not complain when they were counted, but when they were not counted.

Mr. CARLISLE. It shows the commissioners did not agree among themselves.

Mr. ROBESON. But the supreme court say that the Lynch ticket was a false ticket. They do not say that the Chalmers ticket was a false ticket, but the application of their principle would make it so. Now, if Lynch's vote is to be thrown out on that account, and we are held to their construction of the statute, why may we not, when we review the case, throw out the whole vote for Chalmers, which is obnoxious to the same objections on the very principles they themselves declare. But on what ground does this court assume to throw out these votes? I will read the ground stated if gentlemen will listen to me a moment.

The court says the statute provides that these tickets shall be unlawful, "in order that intelligence may guide the electors in their selection," and not a mere device by which ignorance may be captivated and be guided by some mere device or mark by which they should distinguish the ballots they were to use in the process of election without a knowledge of the names of persons for whom they cast their votes, so that "ignorance and blind party devotion might not be led to the adoption of ballots by the guidance of some marks and devices, as to which they were instructed by their leaders, and which, instead of intelligent comprehension of whom or what they are casting their ballots for, should determine their selection of ballots to be cast." That is, "all would be alike, and the advantage of one party over another should not consist in tickets, but the ballots must be selected, not by devices and marks, but because of the names to be voted for."

Now, I would like my friends to pay attention to this proposition. They say, "How will you question the action of the supreme court of the State of Mississippi? You are bound by it." My friends will hardly say we are bound by it in this case, when we are sitting in review of it. It is the very case that we are reviewing. And if we are a court of review, we certainly are not bound by a decision of the court which we are reviewing.

It is not the settled law of Mississippi which gives notice to voters, and their disobedience of which may seem to be a willful defiance of law, or a fraudulent attempt to evade it; it is ex post facto of this case. Why shall we not review it, if we choose? The Supreme Court of the United States holds, and it is sound law, that generally that court is governed by decisions of State courts on State laws and questions. But it has happened in the past, and will happen in the future, that the occasion will arise when they "will refuse to sacrifice truth, justice, and right, because a State tribunal has erected the altar and demands the sacrifice."

But the decision which I have read is wrong, ridiculously, unconstitutionally wrong, even upon the ground upon which they place it, the ground of intelligence. They have no authority to apply any test of intelligence as to the qualification of the voter. By the eighteenth section of the first article of the constitution of Mississippi, to which we must appeal for the purpose of fixing the qualification of voters, it is provided that "no property or educational qualification shall be required for any elector." And yet this court, driven to the wall, as the only ground upon which they can rest their decision, as a question of qualification, say in effect that this test of the statute is a test of qualification, because it tests the intelligence of the voter, and give that effect of the law because they say he must be able to discriminate between tickets by being able to know and understand the names that are upon them. Then they give effect to the law as imposing a new educational qualification in the very face of their constitution.

I say, therefore, that this decision of the supreme court of the State of Mississippi is not only ridiculous on its face but that it is absolutely and absurdly in violation of the constitution of that State under which it exists, and the law of the State which it attempts to execute. Shall we not reverse it? To sustain it would be a wrong to the free people of Mississippi, whose rights it would invade; an insult to the jurisprudence of the country whose principles it recklessly violates, and an attack upon the Constitution of our country, against which it has aimed its feeble but insulting blow.

Gentlemen, I am done with the argument of this case. May I be permitted for a moment to detain you while I make one further observation? It is this: I fear that this interference with free elections, unknown at the North——

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. There were forty-five men convicted in New York last year of election offenses.

Mr. ROBESON. Oh, I do not mean to say that when you pour into the great cities uneducated, untaught, unrestrained masses accustomed only to despotic governments, and make them citizens in defiance of the period of probation fixed by law, these irresponsible voters under irresponsible leaders may not be led to commit crimes. But in no ordinary community of peaceful citizens at the North does this thing happen.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. But these were not the voters who were convicted, but they were, I think, the officers of the election themselves.

Mr. ROBESON. What does that prove?

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Who violated the election laws.

Mr. ROBESON. All I want to say is that I recognize the fact that this attempt to defeat admitted majorities by violence or by chicanery is the growth of an intolerance which is not confined to political questions merely, but is a spirit which always prevails in every community where for generations has been nourished and defended any institution which makes free speech impossible. It is a philosophical and historical fact that so long as there is any subject in the community which may not be discussed, so long free speech is impossible and free discussion gagged on every subject, for intolerance becomes the habit of society, and generations will pass away before impatience of and war against difference of opinion are strong enough often to deny personal and political rights, and sometimes to break through the safeguards of the law itself. It gives color to public sentiment; it controls the public appreciation of right and wrong; it dominates the conduct of administrative officers, and sometimes invades the sacred precincts of the judicial bench.

Now, we have given to the colored men at the South their freedom, as the result and necessity of the great struggle for the life of the nation; and we have given to them political rights because we believed that freedom without political rights was war. I do not mean war in the sense of "the plumed troops and big armies which make ambition virtue." I mean that antagonism of interest, that disturbance of society, that interruption of progress and development which happens in any community where the claim is recognized that the rights of one class of a community rest upon a basis different from those of another.

Thus we gave them political rights for their own and our own benefit, and we gave them also for the benefit of the South itself, that it might have its full measure of development in the practical and effective freedom of all its people; that industry might be free, active, energetic not only, but might be ambitious also; that every man might have behind him the inspiration of the great idea which has made the progress of the world, that he might have encouragement to struggle to lift himself from out of the condition in which he found himself, and rear his children in a condition better than his own.

All that there is or has been of progress in the world since the world began depends upon that one principle which incites and encourages the individual to strike for himself and for his posterity, which inspires and invigorates every feeling of the heart and every faculty of the understanding until the struggle, sacrifice, and achievement of each individual becomes the progress of the nation and the elevation of the race. My friends, the lesson of history is sure and should be heeded. Wherever an insulting and impassable barrier shuts up the career of popular ambition, there all the energies of character are repressed and extinguished.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, we gave them these rights under the Constitution of our country; and for these reasons we will maintain them, State machinery, State laws, State decisions, State chicanery, and State wrongs to the contrary notwithstanding. There is the seat of the Representative fixed by the Constitution of the United States; there is the qualification of the member fixed by the Constitution; there is the qualification of the elector fixed by the Constitution; and when it is admitted or is apparent to our perceptions or our reason that a qualified man has received a majority of qualified votes, by that light we will be guided through the intricacy of State provisions till he enjoys his own and the country has her elected Representative. By these broad principles we must be guided for the maintenance of constitutional rights and national integrity, and I declare them now and here, not only for the encouragement of those who would be oppressed by their disregard, but as notice and admonition to those who may seek to antagonize and defeat them. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SPEER. Mr. Speaker, my vote in this case is controlled solely by what I am convinced is the law. No sense of party obligation has any weight with my opinion. I have listened attentively and with impartial attention to the discussion and it seems to me that a very brief statement will sustain my conclusion, which I am conscious is candid and sincere. It is conceded that to unseat General Chalmers and to seat Mr. Lynch, it is necessary to count for the latter the votes in Warren County which were rejected for alleged informalities. It is conceded that these votes were so rejected. If they were properly rejected it is an end of the contention of contestant, for, as stated, from no other source can there come a sufficient accretion of votes to him to overcome the certified majority of Mr. Chalmers.

Now, it is true that Congress is the judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of its own members, and its judgment is conclusive. In arriving at that judgment, however, there are certain well-settled rules of law which it is right to observe, and which the courts observe, and which have almost uniformly been held as paramount and controlling by Congress. One of these settled principles of law is that the judgment of the highest judicial tribunal of a State in construing a State law is conclusive as to the intent, meaning, and effect of that law.

Now, to determine the question raised against the legality of the ballots rejected in Warren County, it becomes necessary to construe the following State law of Mississippi:

SEC. 137. All ballots shall be written or printed with black ink, with a space of not less than one-fifth of an inch between each name, on plain white news printing paper, not more than two and one-half nor less than two and one-fourth inches wide, without any device or mark by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another, except the words at the head of the tickets; but this shall not prohibit the erasure, correction, or insertion of any name by pencil mark or ink upon the face of the ballot, and a ticket different from that herein prescribed shall not be received or counted.

Has the highest judicial tribunal of Mississippi construed this statute? Let us see. I read, sir, from the case of Oglesby vs. Sigiman, 58 Mississippi Reports, 502:

Ira D. Oglesby, District Attorney, vs. J. I. Sigiman et al., Commissioners of Election.

Appeal from circuit court, Tunica County, Hon. Sam. Powell, judge.

On the 9th of December, 1880, Ira D. Oglesby, district attorney for the third judicial district, filed a petition in the circuit court of Tunica County for a mandamus to compel the commissioners of election in that county to reassemble and recanvass the returns made to them by the inspectors of election of the votes cast at the election on the 2d of November, 1880, for a member of Congress from the sixth Congressional district, and to make a statement of the result of such recanvass to the secretary of state within a time to be prescribed by the court. The petition alleged that the commissioners of election had counted 506 ballots which were illegal, because bearing certain marks and devices prohibited by the statute on elections, and prayed that in the recanvass they be required to reject such illegal ballots. The petition was filed under section 2542 of the code of 1880, and stated as jurisdictional facts that the public is deeply interested in getting a construction of the election law of this State as to the duties of the inspectors and commissioners, concerning which conflicting views are entertained; that these officers are liable to criminal prosecutions, under the laws of the State and of the United States, for any omission or violation of their duties; and that the commissioners of Warren County have already been indicted and arrested for their acts, under the election law.

* * * * * * *

The writ of mandamus was issued, and the commissioners of election appeared and demurred to the petition on the following grounds:

1st. That they are merely ministerial officers, and have no power to reject ballots that have been counted by the inspectors.

2d. That the marks on the ballots for which it is claimed they should be rejected are mere printers' dashes, and are not such distinguishing marks as were contemplated by the statute.

The court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the petition, and the petitioners appealed to this court. The provisions of the election law, code 1880, bearing directly upon the questions involved in this case, are these:

SEC. 137. All ballots should be written or printed in black ink, with a space not less than one-fifth of an inch between each name, on plain white printing newspaper, not more than two and one-half nor less than two and one-fourth inches wide, without any device or mark by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another, except the words at the head of the ticket; but this shall not prohibit the erasure, correction, or insertion of any name by pencil mark or ink upon the face of the ballot; and a ticket different from that herein prescribed shall not be received or counted.

Campbell, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

We think the effect of section 137 of the code of 1880 is to condemn as illegal, and not to be received or counted, every ballot which has on its back or face any device or mark other than names of persons by which one ballot may be distinguished from another. This statute does not condemn devices or marks on the outside of a ballot merely, but clearly embraces the face of the ballot as well. That is apparent from the exception contained in it, and a device or mark on the face of the ballot is as much within what we suppose to have been the object of this provision as one on the outside or back of it. It is apparent from the provision that its object is not only to preserve secrecy as to what ballot an elector casts, which is the leading idea of statutes in some other States, which prohibit any device or mark on a ballot folded which betrays the secret of the voter; its object is to secure absolute uniformity as to the appearance of ballots, in order that intelligence may guide the electors in their selection, and not a mere device or mark by which ignorance may be captivated. The legislature was trying to prevent multitudes from "being voted," and being guided by a mere device or mark by which they should distinguish the ballots they were to use in the process without a knowledge of the names of persons for whom their ballots were being cast.

Elections are a contrivance of government which prescribes who are electors and how they may express their will, and it is a legitimate exercise of power to prescribe the description of ballots which shall be used. Section 137 of the code of 1880 does this, and requires all ballots to be written or printed with black ink, with a minimum space between names, on plain white news printing-paper of a certain width, and without any device or mark by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another, &c.; and it declares that a ticket different from that prescribed shall not be received or counted. Considerations of policy dictated the description of ballots prescribed, and it was deemed of such importance to secure an observance of the requirement that it is declared that ballots not conforming to the description prescribed shall not be received or counted.

It would have been competent to impose a penalty on the circulation or use of such ballots, but the means by which their use is sought to be prevented is the rejection of the ballot when offered or from the count. It is not penal for an elector to use a ballot differing from the legal pattern, but it shall not be counted, and thus he fails to express his will through such an instrumentality. If the device or mark is external and observed by the inspectors they should not receive the ballot. If it is received, and on being opened is discovered to be of the kind condemned as illegal, it is not to be counted; but if the inspectors count such ballots in disregard of law and their duty, the commissioners of election assembled at the court-house, with time and opportunity afforded to scrutinize and correct as far as may be done by the data furnished by the face of the returns, without a resort to evidence aliunde, should reject, as the inspectors should have done, ballots which the law says shall not be counted. The only safe guide as to what ballots are illegal because of devices or marks is the statute. It excludes any mark or device by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another. A distinction between ballots by means of devices or marks instead of by means of the names on them is what the statute aims to prevent, and we are not at liberty to confine the broad language of the statute to any particular description of devices or marks, for ingenuity would evade any such limit. The law should be enforced as written. There is no room for distinction between what is directory and what is mandatory, what is essential and what is not.

I read also from the opinion of Justice George:

I concur entirely in the opinion of the court as drawn up by Judge Campbell. The duty to examine and reject illegal ballots rests on every officer or court required or authorized by law to count them. The statute prohibits the use of any mark or device on a ballot by which one "ticket may be known or distinguished from another." That the mark or device adopted is a mere printer's mark, commonly used for ornamentation, makes no difference. The statute prohibits any distinguishing mark whatever, and no court has a right to do away with the effect of the statute by holding that marks which are mere printers' ornaments may be used. It is wholly unimportant whether the marking on the ticket was the result of ignorance or a design to evade the statute. The inspectors and commissioners have no power to inquire into motives; nor has the statute made motives important. It condemns as illegal every ballot or ticket which is so marked "that it may be known or distinguished from another." The ticket used in this case and made an exhibit to the petition is thus marked, and should have been rejected. We have nothing to do with the policy or impolicy of the statute. The language is plain and does not admit of construction; and it is the duty of the courts and other officers to obey and enforce it in the sense the words clearly indicate.

There was no dissenting opinion.

But it is contended that in this decision the supreme court of Mississippi did not have jurisdiction of the questions of construction it decides. If this is true, it is important as affecting the weight of the authority. But is it true? First, was the application for mandamus properly brought? What is the law of the State on this subject? Section 2542 of the Code of Mississippi provides—

On the petition of the State by its attorney-general, or a district attorney, in any matter affecting the public interest, or on petition of any private person who is interested, the writ of mandamus shall be issued by a circuit court commanding any inferior tribunal, corporation, board, officer, or person to do, or not to do, an act, the performance or omission of which the law especially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station; and where there is not a plain, adequate, and speedy remedy in the ordinary course of law.

In pursuance of this law the district attorney for the third judicial district files the petition. The allegations of the petition clearly present the disputed question concerning the ballots alleged to be invalid. The defendants demur—that is to say, they admit that what is alleged in the petition is true; but though true they say that by the demurrer it makes no case against them, for the reason that the marks on the ticket were not such distinguishing marks as the election law in question condemned. Thus the issue is distinctly made. The court differed with the defendants, and decided with much elaboration of argument from the bench that the tickets were illegal and it was the duty of the election officers to reject them. Now, to recur to the original rule invoked. If it be the duty of Congress to esteem the judgment of the supreme court of a State on the construction of a statute of that State as to its intent, meaning, and effect as conclusive, then this question is concluded, the votes cannot be counted, and General Chalmers cannot be unseated.

Sir, I have, as I think, nothing to do with the impolicy of this Mississippi law. I do not like it, but other States have the same law. A statute almost identical is to-day the law of Ohio:

SEC. 2948. All ballots shall be written on plain, white paper, or printed with black ink, with a space of not less than one-fifth of an inch between each name, on plain, white, news printing-paper, not more than two and one-half nor less than two and three-eighths inches wide, without any device or mark by which one ticket may be known or distinguished from another, except the words at the head of the tickets, and it shall be unlawful for any person to print for distribution at the polls, or distribute to any elector, or vote any ballot printed or written contrary to the provisions hereof; but this section shall not be considered to prohibit the erasure, correction, or insertion of any name by pencil-mark or with ink upon the face of the printed ballot. (71 v. 31, § 2.)

It is sufficient for me to know that the supreme court of Mississippi rejects these ballots. It is the policy of our Government to give the greatest sanctity to such decisions of such courts on questions properly belonging to their jurisdiction, and to-day there are pending before committees of the House and Senate propositions to amend the law relating to the election of President and Vice-President, and in either bill it is proposed to make the supreme law court of the State the tribunal which shall decide the validity of the electoral ticket, and that decision should conclude Congress as to the count. This is clearly illustrative of the importance conceded to the judgments of the State courts. I shall not attempt to multiply reasons, when I have given the controlling reason, but I will say that if the election officers improperly rejected these ballots, and failed to include them in their returns, they were subject to indictment and conviction in the Federal court. They were so indicted, they were tried in the Federal court of that district. There was no dispute as to the facts, and yet under the charge of the Federal judge they were acquitted. So it appears that both the supreme court of the State of Mississippi and the Federal court of that district have passed upon these ballots, and they both held that it was not a violation of the election law of the State to reject them.

Mr. Speaker, these are my convictions, and it is a part of my public duty, as I see it, to vote in accordance with my convictions. It does not receive my attention that the contestant is a colored man and the contestee a white man. If the positions of the two gentlemen were reversed I should vote as I do now. Was not the law as it is I should not hesitate to vote for Mr. Lynch on this contest. I am satisfied that the future of the South, the security and happiness of society, and the great promise of material prosperity which is expanding before the eyes of our people, depend largely on exact and equal justice under the law to our colored people; and, sir, as stated by Mr. Lynch in his eloquent address on yesterday, that is the conviction and purpose of the better and more liberal classes of the Southern people, who are a large majority of the Southern people. Under the baneful influences of machine politics this majority is not always felt, but it is there. It is growing. It is beginning to put aside the control of political rings. It will soon be felt throughout the entire South, and the slogan of a "free ballot and a fair count" will not improperly animate the honest masses of the Southern people, who are as patriotic and devoted to the Union and the Constitution as the people of any other section of our common country.

Sir, no man will do more than I for a free ballot and a fair count. My position on the subject is well known. It is approved by overwhelming majorities in the largest white district of Georgia. There are miserable enemies of society, who would wreck every peaceful and prosperous interest of the people to accomplish partisan victories, who sedulously seek to array race prejudice, and race antagonism, and to keep the people in that abnormal and unhealthy state where the color line divides political parties. Some of these creatures are at their dirty and injurious work down there now; but, sir, such men are not the Southern people. The spirit of conservatism and liberalism and tolerance of political opinion is abroad in the land. The State of Georgia is not behind any of her sister States in the possession of these noble virtues of patriotic citizenship.

I trust, sir, that this case will be decided without any partisan feeling or partisan methods. I accord to every gentleman entire sincerity of purpose and conviction, and only claim that I am actuated by the same motives.

Mr. CARLISLE. Mr. Speaker, this House is now engaged in the performance of a duty and the exercise of a power expressly devolved upon it by the Constitution. We are proceeding to judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of one of our own members; and I submit to the distinguished gentleman on the other side who has preceded me [Mr. ROBESON] that the very terms in which the power is delegated necessarily imply that we are to exercise to a certain extent at least judicial functions. We are to judge, not to guess; and I hold, Mr. Speaker, that in the performance of this duty and in the exercise of this power we are under just as high and solemn an obligation to judge according to the law in determining upon the right of a member to a seat as the people or the election officers in a State are to proceed according to the law in holding the election. I cannot refrain from saying here that I can have no more sympathy with an argument intended to show that we are not bound by the law in deciding questions of this kind presented for our consideration than I have for an argument intended to show that the people of the several districts and the election officers in those districts are not bound by the law in the performance of their duty with reference to this matter.

We are not only bound in my judgment to consider and decide these questions according to the law, but we are under every obligation as a matter of right and justice to decide them according to the law as previously declared, whenever the law upon any given subject has been previously declared. Of course, in all those cases where questions are presented not provided for by previous legislation or previous judicial decisions, we must apply to them such principles of right and justice, and such general rules of law and equity, as we think proper under the circumstances.

The gentleman from New Jersey declares that this House, in determining the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members, is a law unto itself. I submit to him that this is the very definition of arbitrary power—the absolute, arbitrary right in the exercise of an inherent power in the House, if I understand his argument, to decide——

Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman does not wish to misstate my position?

Mr. CARLISLE. Certainly not.

Mr. ROBESON. I said the House was a law unto itself as to the application and effect of fixed principles of evidence.

Mr. CARLISLE. But I understood the gentleman, while asserting that the House was a law unto itself in the application of the fixed principles of evidence, to hold at the same time that it is not bound by legal rules of evidence to the same extent or in the same way that courts of justice are bound.

Mr. ROBESON. I said that, accepting the principles, we were not bound by the rules.

Mr. CARLISLE. In other words, the gentleman proceeded to argue—and he did it very ingenuously—that all the laws in force on this and kindred subjects are merely parts of the machinery or means by which the House in the exercise of its constitutional power should be enabled to accomplish a certain end; and he said that if these means could be so used or perverted as to prevent the House, in the judgment of a majority, from accomplishing what that majority thought ought upon general principles of right and justice to be done in the particular case, then the law, the machinery, the means must be disregarded and the end desired must be accomplished anyhow. I am sure that I do not misrepresent the argument of the gentleman from New Jersey in this respect.

The gentleman would not venture, I am sure, with all his courage, to go into a court of justice and make such an argument. The very object of all courts of judicature in this and every other civilized country is to administer justice in cases presented for their consideration. That is the great purpose for which those courts are organized and maintained; but shall it be said that they are not to administer justice according to law; that if a case shall be presented which in the judgment of the tribunal requires it to disregard the plainest statutes of the country, in order to do justice between the parties before it, it is at liberty to do so, and to make and apply its own rules in the particular case?

I would like to follow the gentleman from New Jersey in his argument upon these and some other questions discussed by him if I had time; but the experience of the gentlemen who have preceded me admonishes me that no one can discuss even the case itself within the limits of one hour, and I can therefore refer but briefly to the argument of the gentleman from New Jersey. The cultivated legal mind of the gentleman from New Jersey discovered immediately, it seems, upon an examination of this report, that there was but one way in which the contestant in this case could be seated, and that was to take the bold high ground which he has announced in his speech that the House is not bound either by statutes enacted by the Legislatures of the States, by decisions pronounced by the courts, or by the rules of evidence recognized in every tribunal where the common law prevails. In that, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is correct. There is no way by which the contestant in this case can be seated upon this record as made up in the Committee on Elections and presented to the House, except by disregarding the statutes and decisions and all the rules of evidence recognized in the judicial tribunals of the country.

So far in this case no gentleman on the other side of the House, except possibly the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. PETTIBONE,] who opened the discussion, has attempted to argue the case upon the record as presented or upon the report made by the majority of the Committee on Elections. We have had general statements and general declamation on the general character of elections in Mississippi; we have had assaults upon the people of that State, assaults upon the supreme court of that State, and assaults upon the election officers; but no gentleman so far has taken up the record in the case and upon the evidence undertaken to convince the judicial mind of the House that there was a case here which required us, on our oaths as members of this body, to unseat General Chalmers and give his seat to the contestant. The majority of the Committee on Elections, after all the labor it could bestow on this case, after every opportunity had been afforded to the contestant and contestee to prepare and present their testimony and to be heard by themselves or by counsel, come into the House with a report which declares, as the only proposition in which that majority could unanimously concur, that the contestant was elected by 385 votes and no more. In order to reach that conclusion the committee was obliged to give its assent to five separate and distinct propositions, no one of which can, in my judgment, be maintained. In the first place the committee was compelled to hold that it would not be bound in this case by the decision of the supreme court of Mississippi declaring the meaning and effect of a statute passed by the Legislature of that State. The chairman of the Committee on Elections I see appears to dissent from this statement, but I have been careful to limit it to the declaration that the committee would not in this particular case be bound by that decision.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not want the gentleman to labor under any misapprehension as to the committee. The position is not stated as it was agreed on in committee. The majority of the committee agreed that this is not a decision of the supreme court of Mississippi at all.

Mr. CARLISLE. I was not undertaking to state the reasons of the Committee on Elections for arriving at the conclusion, but stating simply the conclusion itself. It is true the committee give as a reason why they will not be bound by the decision in this case that in its opinion the court had no jurisdiction of the question presented, and that it was an obitur dictum. I do not propose, within the limited time I intend to address the House, to take up the question as to the character and binding force of that decision, nor do I intend to proceed with an argument to show, as I think could be shown, that these ballots cast by the supporters of the contestant in Warren County were obnoxious to the provisions of the Mississippi statute. These questions have been already discussed elaborately and ably by gentlemen on this side of the House, and so far during this discussion they have not been discussed or touched by gentlemen upon the other side, except so far as the gentleman from New Jersey has referred to them this afternoon.

But in passing I desire to call the attention of the House to the language of the statute of Mississippi under which it was held by the commissioners that these were not legal ballots; and I may say here, in response to some propositions stated by the gentleman from New Jersey, that if a State were to undertake by its law to impose unreasonable and absurd restrictions upon the right of suffrage, restrictions or requirements of such a character as to show that the object of the law was not in good faith to protect the right of suffrage, but to deprive the citizen of the right, in violation of the Constitution, I should not feel myself bound to respect such a statute. It would be unconstitutional and void. But I hold that every State in the Union has an unquestionable right to make all such reasonable regulations with respect to the form and character of the ballot to be used as in the judgment of its Legislature may be deemed necessary to secure the free and untrammeled exercise of this great right of suffrage. It is true that it is not a natural right, but it is a very high and sacred right nevertheless. Experience, however, has demonstrated the fact that in order to secure the right itself, and in order to enable the citizen to exercise it freely and in accordance with his own judgment, certain regulations of law are necessary. So far as these regulations are reasonable and not inconsistent with the exercise of the right itself under the Constitution, they are binding upon the voter and upon every tribunal that may be called upon to consider the legality of the election.

The statute of Mississippi declares what the form of the ballot shall be, and that it shall have upon it no mark or device by which one ballot can be distinguished from another. The test then—the very essence of the question—is, has the ballot upon it any mark or device which will in fact enable the voter or other person to distinguish one from another? Under the statute this becomes at once a simple question of fact. The law does not undertake to declare what shall be the character of the mark or device in order to render the ballot illegal; but it prohibits any mark or device, whatever may be its character, by which one ballot can be distinguished from another ballot voted at the same election.

Now, sir, I would like my distinguished friend from Indiana, the chairman of the Committee on Elections, when he comes to address the House, to declare whether he can or cannot distinguish one of these ballots from the other by the marks and devices upon it, even if every name and every letter were stricken out.

Mr. RANNEY. Can you not distinguish them by the names.

Mr. CARLISLE. But the statute expressly allows the names.

Mr. HORR. Why did they not throw out the tickets having the exclamation point?

Mr. CARLISLE. I do not know but they did.

Mr. CALKINS. I think it may shorten the argument of my friend from Kentucky if he will allow me at this point to state my view. It is that anything that is necessary or proper to be used in the mechanical art of printing, not of itself a mark or device, is not within the law.

Mr. CARLISLE. I have just said, Mr. Speaker, which I think anticipated the position taken by the gentleman from Indiana, that the statute does not undertake to prescribe the character of the mark or device which is prohibited, but makes it a simple question of fact: Has the ticket such a mark or such a device as will enable a person to distinguish one ballot from another? Now the Legislature does not allow a printer's mark, if it be such a mark as that, any more than it allows an eagle or a flag. There are many marks used by printers just as well calculated to distinguish one ballot from another as any device that gentlemen can imagine, and the marks or devices used in this instance certainly came within that category.

But I said that I would not dwell upon this subject, because you may count every one of these marked ballots; the 2,029 marked ballots which were excluded from the computation by the commissioners of Warren County may be included in the computation here, and still General Chalmers is elected, as I shall proceed to show.

Another proposition found by the committee, in order to sustain its conclusion that the contestant was elected by a majority of 385, is that there shall be counted 503 votes for Lynch and 75 votes for Chalmers from two precincts in Bolivar County, although no returns whatever were certified from either of these precincts by the officers who held the election, and there is no legal evidence that either of the candidates received a single vote at either of them. I know this is a very broad statement, but I think that an examination of the record will satisfy the members of the House that it is correct.

On page 15 of the record will be found a statement made by the commissioners of election for Bolivar County and transmitted to the secretary of state, in which they say:

> We have thrown out the Australia precinct box, 30 Democratic and 192 Republican votes, because the returns were not certified to by the inspectors or the clerks. We have thrown out the Bolivar precinct, 45 Democratic and 311 Republican votes, because there was no certified return from the inspectors and clerks. The tally-sheets sent in the box show the names of the electors of the Democratic and Republican parties, of James R. Chalmers, John R. Lynch, G. B. Lancaster, M. Roland, James Winters, Fleming and James White, but does not show for what office they were voted for.

They had from neither of these precincts any certified returns whatever; but in one of the ballot-boxes from one of the precincts they found certain tally-sheets which had on them the names of certain gentlemen, without any designation of the offices for which they were candidates. They absolutely, then, had before them no legal evidence or any evidence of any kind known to the law that there had been even an election held in these precincts. Under the statute of the State of Mississippi it was the duty of these inspectors and clerks of election to make out and certify these returns, and they ought to have discharged that duty, but they did not do it.

Just here I want to repeat what I said in response to the gentleman from New Jersey while he was speaking, that I do not question the truth of the proposition that the voter does not lose his right simply because the election officers fail to do their duty. But if the election officers fail to certify the vote, then I think we are all agreed that in order to entitle a candidate to that vote he must prove it by legal evidence. The gentleman from New Jersey certainly admitted that much.

Now, I want to call the attention of the gentleman who presides over the deliberations of the Committee on Elections, and who made this report, to the declaration that there is not in this record a shadow of evidence of any kind whatever in relation to the election alleged to have been held at Australia and Bolivar precints except the naked statement just read. If I am wrong about this I would consider it a favor if he or some gentleman upon the other side would call my attention to that testimony.

Mr. CALKINS. I cannot do that in your time.

Mr. CARLISLE. Yes, you can.

Mr. CALKINS. I cannot call to your attention just now the specific parts of the evidence which lead the committee to the finding of a fact which is summed up and stated as a fact; but I will do so in my closing argument.

Mr. CARLISLE. The committee itself does not refer to any other evidence. It is not claimed in the majority report that there is any testimony in relation to the vote at Australia and Bolivar precincts, in Bolivar County, except that statement which I have read. There is not even the certificate of a county supervisor of elections; there is not the certificate of a clerk of any kind. There is not, so far as I know or believe—and if I am mistaken gentlemen are invited to correct me—there is not a word of testimony given by any witness in the case on this subject.

The committee stands here upon the naked proposition that the commissioners of elections have said in their report of the election in that county to the secretary of state that certain papers came to them from those two precincts not signed by anybody; that it appeared by the ballots that so many votes were Republican and so many were Democratic; but they do not state, and had no authority to state, that there was a single vote cast for Lynch, or a single vote cast for Chalmers; and if gentlemen will look at these tickets they will have no difficulty in understanding how it was that the commissioners were able to tell how many Democratic ballots and how many Republican ballots were found in those boxes. One ticket is headed "Democratic Conservative Ticket," and the other is headed "Republican National Ticket."

Mr. CALKINS. I have now the testimony. I wish to say to the gentleman that on page 96 of the record he will find a full statement by the supervisors of the ballots cast at each of those polls. And I call attention to the further fact that there is the sworn bill in chancery.

Mr. CARLISLE. On page 96 of the record?

Mr. CALKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARLISLE. On page 96 I find a certificate from O. Davis, chief supervisor, in relation to the election in Coahoma County, and at the bottom of the page I find a certificate from O. Davis, chief supervisor, in relation to the election at Holmes Lake, in Bolivar County. And I have not said anything about Holmes Lake.

Mr. CALKINS. I beg pardon of the gentleman. The certificate refers to all precincts; Rosedale, Australia, Concordia, Terrene, Beulah, Glencoe, Grange Hill, Tupper's Store, and Bolivar Landing.

Mr. CARLISLE. Where is that?

Mr. CALKINS. That is in the middle of the page.

Mr. CARLISLE. I must say in response to the gentleman that this had escaped my attention entirely. I examined the index very carefully for reference to the certificates of chief supervisors and I found, as gentlemen will ascertain by referring to it, that there is in the index no reference to the certificates of chief supervisors from the precincts mentioned. I will come after a while to discuss the question whether or not the certificates of supervisors in country districts, as they are called, (being districts outside of the cities and towns which contain a population of 20,000,) are evidence under the statute.

The majority of the committee itself does not find that such certificates are legal evidence and does not allude to them in this report. So far as the report goes it places this vote alone upon the statement which I had previously read. The majority of the committee in this report expressly say that they do not rely upon the certificates of these supervisors in any case.

Therefore my statement with regard to these two precincts, and with regard to the legal evidence contained in this record to support the views of the majority is correct, with the exception to which my attention has just been called.

Mr. CALKINS. And the sworn bill in chancery.

Mr. CARLISLE. I suppose the gentleman does not call that testimony.

Mr. CALKINS. I call your attention to it.

Mr. CARLISLE. The contestant, Lynch, filed a bill in chancery for the purpose of procuring an injunction against the secretary of state to prevent him from issuing a certificate of election to General Chalmers. In that bill he stated that certain votes were cast in certain counties. I suppose it is not necessary for me to argue that his allegations made in that pleading are not legal evidence against the contestee. I would like at this point to call the attention of gentlemen who believe that colored voters are necessarily Republican voters to the facts disclosed by Mr. Lynch himself in that bill in chancery, and in his notice of contest in this case. The sixth Congressional district of the State of Mississippi is composed of twelve counties, and there is a large colored majority in each and every one of them. In the notice of contest in this case, a paper which usually, as we all know, challenges every fact about which there is the least suspicion or the slightest shadow of a ground for complaint, the contestant does not assail the fairness or legality of the vote at any precinct in four of those counties. These are the counties: Quitman County, Sharkey County, Tunica County, and Claiborne County.

In Quitman County, where Mr. Chalmers received 153 votes and Lynch received 83 votes, there were registered 199 white voters and 217 colored voters. Yet the contestant admits in his notice, and in all the proceedings throughout this contest, that although Mr. Chalmers received nearly twice as many votes as he did, the election in that county was perfectly fair.

In Sharkey County Mr. Chalmers recived 484 votes and Lynch only 165 votes. Yet the voters, as classified by race, were registered as 391 white and 1,252 colored. In Tunica County Mr. Chalmers received 239 votes and Lynch 506; Lynch received the majority, and the voters as classified by race were 451 white and 2,055 colored.

In Wilkinson County Mr. Chalmers received 1,691 votes and Lynch 814, not quite one-half the number, although the voters were classified by race as 855 white and 2,567 colored.

In the county of Claiborne, where the white registered vote was 986, and the colored registered vote 2,566, Mr. Chalmers received 1,061 votes and Lynch 288. But the contestant makes no question about the fairness of the vote or count in that county, except that he says that at one precinct there were from 30 to 50 votes taken out of the box which were cast for him, and a like number of votes substituted for the other side; but there is no evidence to support this charge. In Jefferson County, where Chalmers received 1,043 votes and Lynch 386, there were registered only 951 white voters and 2,419 colored voters, and there is no complaint of the election in that county, except it is said that while the inspectors of election were on their way to deliver the returns to the commissioners some unknown parties intercepted them and took away from them the box of Rodney precinct, which contained 92 votes for Chalmers and 247 for Lynch. General Chalmers at once admitted that the vote ought to be counted; and it is counted. Nobody knows who took the votes away and each party suspects the other.

I call the attention of gentlemen to this, for the purpose of showing that they are not justifiable in concluding, simply because there is a majority of colored votes in a county or a precinct, that therefore the Republican candidate must have carried that county or precinct.

The next proposition found by the majority of the Committee on Elections is that there should be counted for Lynch 742 votes and for Chalmers 89 votes from three precincts in Issaquena County, on a certificate made by the clerk of the chancery court in that county, although there is no law of the State which makes that clerk the custodian of any paper whatever relating to elections. This is the law:

SEC. 105. The books of registration of the electors of the several election districts in each county and the poll-books as heretofore made out shall be delivered by the county board of registration in each county, if not already done, to the clerk of the circuit court of the county, who shall carefully preserve them as records of his office, and the poll-books shall be delivered in time for every election to the commissioners of election, and after the election shall be returned to said clerk.

Here is a statute which speaks of two kinds of books, and no more. It speaks of nothing but books. The first is the registration-book, which contains the names of all the registered and legally qualified voters in the county. That remains in the office of the circuit court clerk permanently as a part of the records of his office. The other book is the poll-book, which is simply a transcript of the names on the registration-book belonging to each precinct separately. That is to say, just before the election the clerk of the circuit court takes the registration-book and copies from it into another book the names of all the registered voters, for instance, in Australia precinct, Bolivar County; and this is the poll-book which he transmits under the statute to the officers of election in order that they may have before them, when the people come to vote, evidence which will enable them to decide whether a person offering to vote is or is not a registered voter. The officers of the election do not enter anything upon that book; it is merely there for reference, and the statute says that when the election is over it "shall be returned to said clerk." So that according to this statute the only books or papers relating to the holding of elections in the State of Mississippi, of which the clerk of the circuit court, not the chancery court, has the custody or control, are, first, the book of registration, and secondly, the poll-book, which is merely, as I have said, a transcript of a part of the book of registration.

Now, the gentleman from New Jersey put to me the question whether I was willing to concede that a clerk, even in the absence of an express statutory provision authorizing him to do so, might lawfully certify as an instrument of evidence a paper which was legally in his custody as an official. I said to the gentleman that whatever doubt there might have been about that question heretofore, I would admit, not that such an officer could certify the fact that there is such a paper there, but that he can make a transcript of that paper and certify that it is a true copy, and then it would be a legal instrument of evidence. That being the law, it follows that the clerk of the circuit court in Issaquena County has power under this statute to certify copies of the book of registration and the poll-book; but he has no power to certify as to any other paper or book in relation to elections.

What are the other books and papers used in conducting an election in the State of Mississippi? In the first place the officers who actually conduct the election, by receiving the votes, are required to make a list of the voters. When any citizen approaches the polls to cast his vote, these officers are required to put his name down on the list, and when the poll has been closed they are required to make out and certify a statement of the vote cast at their respective precincts. This statement, as gentlemen will see from looking into this record, consists simply of what is usually called a tally-list—the name of the persons voted for with a statement of the votes received. This is the paper which the inspectors and the clerks of the election certify to the commissioners. There is not a line or a word in the statutes of Mississippi which requires or authorizes the commissioners or any other officer in the State to send either of these papers to the office of the circuit clerk or the chancery clerk. If there is, I trust that gentlemen who follow me in this debate will point it out to the House.

These are the papers which the inspectors of election send to the commissioners, and from them the commissioners make up their statement which they transmit to the secretary of state. There is no statute making these papers records in any office whatever in the State of Mississippi.

Now, sir, the statute which I have read makes the clerk of the circuit court the custodian of the registration-book and the poll-book, and nothing else. The majority of the committee has counted three precincts in Issaquena County upon the certificate, not of the circuit court, the only official in the county who has custody of any paper relating to the election, but on the certificate of the chancery court of that county. Why this is done I do not know, except that I have been informed outside of the record that in the State of Mississippi the same person who acts as circuit court clerk acts also as chancery clerk, or may do so; but what difference does that make? In the State of Kentucky, as my colleagues very well know, there is nothing to prohibit the same person from holding both the office of county court clerk and circuit court clerk, and very frequently the office is united in the person of the same man. As clerk of the county court he is the recorder of deeds, mortgages, leases, and other recordable instruments, and has the right to certify transcripts of them to become evidence in the courts. As clerk of the circuit court he has the power to certify orders and records of that court to be instruments of evidence in other tribunals. But suppose he should certify a deed or will from the records of the county court as clerk of the circuit court, would there be the slightest room for difference of opinion on the question whether that was a legal certification? I imagine none whatever, but you have not even that case here. You have a case here where, if the man had certified as circuit court clerk, the only officer who is named in the statute, he would be undertaking to certify to a paper which does not belong to his office under any law of the State and over which he has no control whatever.

The majority of the committee counts the votes from these three precincts, 742 votes, for Lynch upon that certificate of the clerk of the chancery court. The only other evidence referred to by the majority of the committee as to these precincts is this. It is a statement made by the commissioners of election from Bolivar County to the secretary of state, and it will be found on page 17 of the record:

Hon. HENRY C. MYERS,
Secretary of State, Jackson, Miss.:

We, the undersigned commissioners and clerk, having canvassed the returns of the election held on the 2d day of November, A. D. 1880, at the following places in the State of Mississippi, county of Issaquena, report as follows—said report being certified to by us as true and correct—to wit: District No. 1: election held at Duval's Landing. We find eighty-two votes were cast, and that number of ballots were found by us in the box; we did not find any separate lists of the names of the voters in the box, as required by section 139 of the Revised Code of the State of Mississippi. We, the commissioners, decide to throw out the box. District No. 2: election held at Hays's Landing. We find seventy-five votes reported by commissioners and clerks of election at this precinct, and we find in the box seventy-one votes and four ballots, in which all the names were scratched.

We do not find any separate lists of names of the voters in the box, as required by section 139, Revised Code of Mississippi. We, the commissioners, decide to throw the box out. District No. 3: election held at Ben Lomond. We find three hundred and fifty-two votes reported by the commissioners and clerks of the election at this precinct. We find in the box, as counted and tallied by us, three hundred and seventy votes. We do not find in the box any lists, separate or otherwise, of the names of the voters, as required by section 139 of the Revised Code of Mississippi. We, the commissioners, decide to throw out the box.

I call the attention of the House to the fact that the commissioners do not state or undertake to state anything whatever in relation to the character of these votes, whether they were Democratic or Republican, or were cast for Lynch or Chalmers.

I will not read section 139, because it has been read frequently in the hearing of the House.

On the next page of the record we find the following:

District No. 5.—Election held at Duncansby. We find 420 votes reported by the commissioners and clerks of the election at this precinct, and, upon opening the box and counting the ballots, we find 444 ballots in the box. We do not find any separate lists, or lists of any kind, of the names of the voters, as required by section 139, Revised Code of the State of Mississippi. We, the commissioners, decide to throw out the box.

Here, then, are three precincts in the county of Issaquena sent up to the commissioners with no list of the voters accompanying the returns as required by section 139 of the code. Gentlemen will see at once the importance of this list of voters. Unless the election officers send up to the commissioners as required by the statute a separate list containing the names of the persons who had voted, the commissioners can have no means of determining whether the votes had all been cast by one man or by a number of men corresponding to the number of votes. They had no means whatever of comparing the list of persons who voted with the list of persons who were entitled to vote as shown on the registration-book or poll-book sent out to the election precinct for the guidance of the officers of the election.

The papers came up to them then in that condition without any evidence from which they could determine how many men had cast the votes, or whether they were the men whose names were on the list, or perfect strangers in the country, and consequently they rejected them.

But it is not necessary for me to argue the question whether the commissioners were right in rejecting them. They did reject them, and it was perfectly competent for the contestant, if he desired to do so, to prove that the votes were cast for him. I admit that he had that right. He had the right to a certain number of votes which were cast for him, at Ben Lomond for instance, and if they were not counted for him he had the right to show the fact that they were cast for him, the same right that the contestee had under similar circumstances.

The commissioners of election did not certify that there was a single vote cast for Mr. Chalmers, or a single vote cast for Mr. Lynch. They say they found so many ballots in the box, but whether they were cast for Lynch, or Chalmers, or somebody else, did not appear. Upon that statement of the commissioners the majority of the committee have taken the certificate of the clerk of the chancery court that certain papers purporting to be tally-sheets, nothing else—not a list of voters, no ballot-box, or ballots—but that certain papers which purport upon their face to be tally-sheets kept at these three precincts are on file in his office, and he certifies to them. "Of record," he says, "in my office," and he certifies that they are correct transcripts as he finds them on record in his office, and upon that statement the majority of the committee count this vote.

Mr. MASON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CARLISLE. Certainly.

Mr. MASON. Did the inspectors of elections make returns to the commissioners of election in these three precincts?

Mr. CHALMERS. There is no evidence that they did.

Mr. CARLISLE. I will state the facts. The commissioners in their report to the secretary of state, as I have just read, state that they sent up to them the returns:

> We find 75 votes reported by the commissioners and clerks of election at this precinct, and we find in the box 71 votes and 4 ballots in which all the names were scratched. We do not find any separate list of names of the voters in the box as required by section 139, Revised Code of Mississippi.

Now, my friend from New York will see that the commissioners did not say whether the inspectors or clerks of election have certified anything to them or not. They do say that they find seventy-five votes reported by the commissioners and clerks of election, but nothing else. In what form they were reported the record does not show, and I do not know, but the reason given by the commissioners for the rejection of the vote was that the returns were not accompanied by the separate list of votes in these three precincts.

Mr. MASON. That is under section 139.

Mr. CARLISLE. Yes, sir. Now, as I said before, it does not appear from this statement for whom these votes were cast. It does not appear for what office they were cast. There is a simple statement that they found in the box so many ballots, and that the commissioners and clerks sent a return showing 75 votes, without saying whether they were all for one side or all for the other. Then there is no evidence to show for whom they were cast. They did not count them. They said they could not count them.

Mr. CALKINS. The commissioners of election said they would not count them.

Mr. CARLISLE. I say so. But the majority of the Committee on Elections count them, not upon the returns as they appear from the box, but upon the certificate of the chancery clerk that he finds in that office in Issaquena County certain tally-sheets which he certified, and which are put into this record as evidence. How they got into the office of the clerk of the chancery court nobody knows. Then here are these alleged tally-sheets. Gentlemen will find them on pages 89 to 95 or 96 of this record, showing the number of votes cast. The commissioners make no return of these votes on which a count can be based.

Mr. RANNEY. They agreed with the supervisors' report.

Mr. CARLISLE. Not exactly. The commissioners say they find 420 ballots in the box at the Duncansby precinct. If you look at this tally-sheet we find there were only 417.

Mr. HORR. Are they not substantially the same?

Mr. CARLISLE. There are the papers to show for themselves. How they got into the chancery clerk's office we have no means of knowing, for there is no law which authorizes him to keep or certify the papers. Gentlemen simply assert that because the papers which he certifies are substantially alike, or because in some respects they correspond with the returns of the commissioners, they are the same.

It might have been sufficient if gentlemen had taken oral evidence to prove that these were the genuine tally-sheets; but the only evidence to support them is the certificate of an unauthorized officer. If he has any authority, my friend from Indiana can show it to the House when he comes to make the argument.

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman pardon me for interrupting him? There is no evidence in the record to show they were the papers sent up by the inspectors.

Mr. CARLISLE. I have said so.

Mr. CALKINS. What is not objected to is admitted. The only objection is they are not certified to by the circuit clerk. The gentleman is making a technical objection now.

Mr. CARLISLE. I am not. I am making a legal and substantive objection; that they come from a place where they had no right to be. I have already said that the clerk of the circuit court even had no right to certify those papers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CARLISLE. I will not trespass longer on the time of the House; but I desire simply to say this——

Many MEMBERS. "Go on!"

Mr. CARLISLE. In ten minutes I can say all I wish to say in relation to the question of the competency of the supervisors' certificates.

Mr. ROBESON. You can have unlimited time.

Mr. MOULTON. Go on and elucidate that point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the time of the gentleman from Kentucky being extended.

Mr. CARLISLE. The fact has been disclosed since I began my remarks that as to the two precincts in Bolivar County, Australia and Bolivar precincts, there are in the record, in addition to the statement made by the commissioners, certificates from the United States supervisors of election; and, as I understand, it is claimed now, although it is not claimed in the report, that these certificates are legal instruments of evidence in this case.

Mr. ATHERTON. I would like to interrupt the gentleman long enough to say that I do not think the chairman of the Committee on Elections, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS,] claims any such thing.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not.

Mr. CARLISLE. It has been claimed, not by the gentleman from Indiana, but by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. PETTIBONE,] who opened the discussion on the other side of the House, that the certificates of the supervisors are competent evidence.

Mr. Speaker, there were originally two statutes upon this subject. There was the act of February 28, 1871, which provided for the appointment of a chief supervisor of elections and for the appointment, upon the application of two citizens, of other supervisors to be present when the election is held. This law applied only to cities and towns having a population of 20,000 or more, and it gave to the supervisors in those places the power to be present at all times when elections for members of Congress were to be held, and the power to scrutinize and count the vote and to certify to the chief supervisor of elections all such facts in relation to the election as that officer might require them to certify. It gave to them the power to arrest for violations of law, with or without warrant, the same power as was given to the marshals.

In 1872 that statute was amended, and the United States circuit courts were authorized to appoint supervisors of elections in districts outside of cities and towns having a population of twenty thousand and upward. They were authorized to appoint these supervisors, not upon the application of any two citizens, as was the case with reference to the others, but for any county or parish or district upon the application of any ten persons who might ask for the appointment. But it was expressly provided in this act of 1872 that the supervisors appointed under its authority were simply to be witnesses of the casting and counting of the vote and the making of the returns. I will read the whole provision presently. All the confusion, if there is any confusion upon this subject, arises from the fact that the provisions of both these acts are compiled and printed together in the Revised Statutes. In some sections we find provisions taken from both the original acts, while in other cases we find entire sections in the Revised Statutes taken altogether from one of the acts.

If there were any legal difficulty in construing these statutes we have the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States for saying that it is not only our right but our duty to refer to the original law and see how the matter stood at the time the revision and compilation was made. This is what the Supreme Court said in the case of the United States vs. Bowen, in 10 Otto:

> Counsel for Government admitting that it—
> Speaking of a statute—
> admitting that it has no longer any force independently of the section of the revision which we are called on to construe, insist that a resort may be had to the law which was the subject of revision to interpret anything left in doubt by the language of the revisers.
> This principle is undoubtedly sound, and where there is a substantial doubt as to the meaning of the language used in the revision, the old law is a valuable source of information. The Revised Statutes must be treated as the legislative declaration of the statute law on the subjects which they embraced on the 1st day of December, 1873. When the meaning is plain the courts cannot look to the statutes which have been revised to see if Congress erred in that revision, but may do so when necessary to construe doubtful language used in expressing the meaning of Congress. If, then, in the case before us, the language of section 4820 was fairly susceptible of the construction claimed by the Government, as well as of the opposite one, the argument from the provision of the statute as it stood before the revision would be conclusive.

Let us look now at those statutes as they stood before the revision, a revision which the Supreme Court declares must be held to contain the law as it stood in December, 1873.

Mr. RANNEY. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to this point? Does he wish to be understood as saying that both those sections as they stand in the Revised Statutes are not to be construed as they stand there; and whether, as the construction of a particular section, this particular matter shall not stand as the law on the statute-book?

Mr. CARLISLE. In the case to which I refer, my recollection is, although my attention was not directed particularly to that point, that the question was as to the construction of a single statute which had been revised and incorporated into the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. RANNEY. Does not the first section of that statute, in regard to supervisors, apply to country and city supervisors? And in regard to the subsequent section to which reference is made both must stand together.

Mr. CARLISLE. I am willing, for the purpose of this discussion, to treat this entire title of the Revised Statutes of the United States as one statute; and I think no lawyer who examines it can hesitate a moment as to its meaning. Surely that is as fair a method of treating it as any gentleman can ask.

Now, let us see. I have already said that there were certain supervisors of election who not only had the power but whose duty it was under the law to certify, upon the requisition of the chief supervisors, any facts that may have occurred affecting the fairness or legality of the election or the vote that was cast at the election; and I have said that those were only the supervisors who were originally provided for by the act of 1871, and that the act of 1872, either by itself or taken as it stands here in connection with the other, has not altered or changed their powers or extended their duties in the slightest respect. The section of the statute which relates to the certification of facts and votes by the supervisors is section 2018, which I will read:

To the end that each candidate for the office of Representative or Delegate in Congress may obtain the benefit of every vote for him cast, the supervisors of election are, and each of them is, required to personally scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot in their election district or voting precinct cast, whatever may be the indorsement on the ballot, or in whatever box it may have been placed or be found; to make and forward to the officer who, in accordance with the provisions of section 2025, has been designated as the chief supervisor of the judicial district in which the city or town wherein they may serve, acts, such certificates and returns of all such ballots as such officer may direct and require, and to attach to the registry list, and any and all copies thereof and to any certificate, statement, or return, whether the same, or any part or portion thereof, be required by any law of the United States, or of any State, Territorial, or municipal law, any statement touching the truth or accuracy of the registry, or the truth or fairness of the election and canvass, which the supervisors of the election, or either of them, may desire to make or attach, or which should properly and honestly be made or attached, in order that the facts may become known.

In regard to that last clause of the statute, "in order that the facts may become known," the minority of the Committee on Elections of this House, during the Forty-fifth Congress, (Mr. HISCOCK of New York, Mr. WAIT of Connecticut, Mr. Price of Iowa, Mr. Thornburg of Tennessee being among them,) held that the certificates given by these supervisors in cities and towns having a population of over 20,000 were not evidence. That was in the contested-election case from Boston. I think they went a great deal too far. I think that under this statute the certificates given by these supervisors in that class of towns and cities are evidence; not conclusive evidence, but legal evidence of the facts.

Mr. RANNEY. Allow me to see if I understand you. Suppose it is true, and I believe you assume it to be true, that under the first section the country supervisors as well as the city supervisors are required or authorized to make reports. Now, if they are authorized to make reports, are not the reports which they make official, and are they not evidence which this House may rely upon, on the principle of the case in connection with the Signal Bureau, where the signal officer keeps a record of the weather? There is no provision of law that that record shall be evidence, yet the Supreme Court has decided that a certified copy of that record is evidence in court, because it is an official record which the office is authorized and required to keep.

Mr. CARLISLE. If my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY] understands me to assume that under section 2018 these supervisors outside of cities and towns having 20,000 inhabitants are required to make reports, then he misunderstands me.

Mr. RANNEY. I understand that they are required to make such reports as the chief supervisor may require of them.

Mr. CARLISLE. Not at all. I say that this statute shows upon its face, independently of the fact previously mentioned by me, that it is taken entirely from the old law upon the subject, and independently of another section of the statute, which I will read presently, that the purpose of Congress was to require this report only from the supervisors of cities and towns. I will read the language again:

To make and forward to the officer who, in accordance with the provisions of section 2025, has been designated as the chief supervisor of the judicial district in which the city or town wherein they may serve, acts, such certificates and returns of all such ballots as such officer may direct and require, &c.

Mr. RANNEY. Does not that statute comprehend both country and city supervisors?

Mr. CARLISLE. Some part of the statute does.

Mr. RANNEY. And the two should go together.

Mr. CARLISLE. Some portions do. But when we come to see what supervisors shall make reports we find that they are to make reports from the cities and towns wherein they serve. Now, take that in connection with this clear and explicit declaration of section 2029, a later section, if we are to treat this as one statute:

The supervisors of election appointed for any county or parish in any Congressional district, at the instance of ten citizens, as provided in section 2011, shall have no authority to make arrests, or to perform other duties than to be in the immediate presence of the officers holding the election, and to witness all their proceedings, including the counting of the votes and the making of a return thereof.

Mr. RANNEY. Does not that refer to witnessing the returns which the inspectors make; not to returns which they are to make themselves?

Mr. CARLISLE, (reading.)

They shall have no authority to make arrests or to perform other duties than to be in the immediate presence of the officers holding the election, and to witness all their proceedings, including the counting of the votes and the making of a return thereof.

Now, we know something of the legislative history of this law, and what construction was put upon it at the time it was passed. We know that General Garfield, who reported it to this House from the committee of conference, expressly declared in his place that the purpose was merely to make these officers witnesses of what occurred, and that they would have no power to certify any returns. They receive no pay. They are a different class of supervisors altogether from those provided for in the other parts of the statute.

Mr. CHALMERS. The gentleman will allow me to call his attention to the fact that the first class of supervisors are required themselves to count——

Mr. CARLISLE. And certify.

Mr. CHALMERS. And these are required simply to witness the count.

Mr. CARLISLE. It was said when the bill was under consideration that the Government would have reliable witnesses from each party present at the election to testify afterward, if any question should be raised as to the legality and fairness of the election.

Mr. Speaker, this is all I desire to say. I am very much obliged to the House for extending my time. If I could have obtained the floor at an earlier hour it was my purpose to discuss some of the other questions in the case; but I think it a matter of justice to the House and myself that I should not now occupy the floor longer.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, I now, in accordance with the understanding had this morning, move the previous question; and I shall follow that with a motion to adjourn unless the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] desires to submit the report of a committee of conference.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CASWELL. I submit the report of the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Post-Office appropriation bill. I ask that the report and accompanying statement be read.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] desire present consideration of this report?

Mr. CANNON. I suggest that the report be considered the first thing in the morning.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not make the motion to adjourn because I believe there was an agreement for a recess.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the motion that the House adjourn.

Mr. CALKINS. I have no objection; I merely wanted to carry out the agreement.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 5352) to amend the laws with reference to elections in West Virginia; and

To Mr. HOBLITZELL, for to-morrow on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the House adjourn.

Mr. CALKINS. I hope there will be no objection to the motion. I understand that gentlemen on the other side wish the use of the Hall to-night; and it is a matter of common courtesy that they should have it.

The motion of Mr. RANDALL was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 29, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 2938) for the relief of Thomas Evans; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5804) to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese.

PLATE-PRINTING PRESSES IN TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to report to this House, in addition to the information already requested of him in the matter of work done on steam-power plate-printing presses in the Treasury Department, the original estimate of the cost of said machines now in use, together with their actual cost; a detailed statement of all repairs and all other expenses thereon; the number of such presses now in operation; the number of impressions printed on the several presses during their operation up to date, and the actual cost of such work from every cause; together with copies of all official reports made on said presses prior to and since their introduction to the Department.

P. F. LONERGAN.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move by unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4704) for the relief of P. F. Lonergan, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 2984, and that it be put upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate the claim of P. F. Lonergan, of Pike County, Missouri, for the sum of $646.48, being the amount of income tax alleged to have been unlawfully collected of him on his salary and compensation as sheriff and collector of the county of Pike, in the State of Missouri; and in case he shall be satisfied that such claim, or any part thereof, was unlawfully collected, he shall refund the same to the said Lonergan, or his personal representatives, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

There was no objection, and the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BUCKNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REFUNDING DUTIES.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move by unanimous consent the bill (H. R. No. 176) to refund certain duties paid upon military uniforms imported by and for use of Company G, Sixth Regiment Infantry, Illinois National Guard, be taken from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar and put on its passage at this time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to refund to William H. Thompson, colonel commanding Sixth Regiment of Infantry of the Illinois National Guard, the sum of $490.80; said sum being the amount of duties paid by the said William H. Thompson to the collector of customs, port of Chicago, the 27th day of December, A. D. 1880, upon fifty-four uniforms, and appurtenances thereto belonging, imported by and for the sole use (as military uniforms) of Company G, Sixth Regiment Infantry, Illinois National Guard.

Mr. RANDALL. That bill comes from the Committee on Ways and Means, and was in charge of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MORRISON,] who is not now present; but it is all right, he having reported it back favorably.

The Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ASSIGNMENT OF JUDGE FOR NEVADA.

Mr. CASSIDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. CASSIDY. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw his demand for a moment, so I may call up a matter of great importance to the people of my State. It will take but a moment. I wish to ask to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. No. 1287, and to put it on its passage. It is to assign a judge to the United States court.

Mr. HOLMAN. You want to retire a judge on full pay.

Mr. CASSIDY. We want to assign an additional judge.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know; but you want to retire a judge on full pay.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FORNEY. I move by unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 3208) making appropriations for the fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, be taken from the Speaker's table and the House insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and agree to the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses as requested by the Senate.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CASWELL. I wish now to call up the conference report on the Post-Office appropriation bill. It is printed in the RECORD, page 3438.

The SPEAKER. The report has not been returned from the Printing Office.

CHINESE BILL.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 5804) to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese for concurrence.

Mr. HOOKER. This is an important measure. I do not know what these amendments are. It is too important a measure to pass in this summary way.

Mr. PAGE. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi will not object.

Mr. HOOKER. I want to know what the amendments are.

Mr. PAGE. Let them be read.

Mr. HOOKER. I withdraw my objection to let the amendments be read.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the demand for the regular order in favor of the proposition, but not afterward.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the amendments.

Mr. KASSON. To facilitate action, I ask that the amendments be considered as concurred in as read, unless excepted to.

Mr. ATKINS. They are not being read for action. The bill and amendments should be printed and fully considered.

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to say that my objection to this bill may not exist after I have carefully examined these amendments. It must be apparent to the House that a matter of so much importance with so many amendments should not be hastily considered. I am not opposing it, and probably will not. It will do no harm to let the matter pass over till Monday next. I will suggest to the gentleman that he let it be printed in the RECORD and go over until Monday, when it may come up for consideration.

Mr. PAGE. If the gentleman from Mississippi wants to object to the present consideration of the bill I shall be obliged to let it go over.

Mr. HOOKER. I do object to it at this time.

Mr. PAGE. Then I ask that the bill, with the Senate amendments, be printed in the RECORD. Perhaps it would be well to let the bill be printed as it passed the Senate.

Mr. KASSON. Let the bill with the Senate amendments be printed in full in the RECORD.

Mr. RANDALL. It should appear in the RECORD in the usual form, that is the original bill with the Senate amendments.

Mr. PAGE. Perhaps that would be better, to have the House bill with the Senate amendments printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendments be printed in italics, so that they may be indicated in the bill at a glance.

The SPEAKER. That is the usual practice in printing bills.

Mr. CASSIDY. I would suggest that the House bill as it originally passed the House be printed, and the bill as it passed the Senate also, so that a comparison can be made between the two.

Mr. PAGE. I think that is unnecessary. Let the House bill with the Senate amendments be printed in the order in which they would appear in the bill, and printed in italics in the usual form.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the bill will be printed in the RECORD, with the Senate amendments in italics.

Mr. HASKELL. I ask that it be printed also in bill form in the usual form with the Senate amendments in italics, and the portions of the House bill stricken out in the Senate printed with a line drawn through them.

The SPEAKER. Without objection both orders will be made.

There was to objection.

The bill with Senate amendments is as follows:

[Parts stricken out are printed in brackets and parts to be inserted in italics.]

An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese.

Whereas in the opinion of the Government of the United States the coming of Chinese laborers to this country endangers the good order of certain localities within the territory thereof: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the expiration of [sixty] ninety days next after the passage of this act, and until the expiration of ten years next after the passage of this act, the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States be, and the same is hereby, suspended; and during such suspension it shall not be lawful for any Chinese laborer to come, or, having so come after the expiration of said [sixty] ninety days, to remain within the United States.

SEC. 2. That [any] the master of any vessel, [of whatever nationality,] who shall knowingly [on such vessel] bring within the [jurisdiction of the] United States on such vessel, and land or permit to be landed, any Chinese laborer, from any foreign port or place, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 for each and every such Chinese laborer so brought, and may be also imprisoned for a term not exceeding one year.

SEC. 3. That the two foregoing sections shall not apply to Chinese laborers who were in the United States on the 17th day of November, 1880, or who shall have come into the same before the expiration of [sixty] ninety days next after the passage of this act, and who shall produce to such master before going on board such vessel, and shall produce to the collector of the port in the United States at which such vessel shall arrive, the evidence hereinafter in this act required of his being one of the laborers in this section mentioned; nor shall the two foregoing sections apply to the case of any master whose vessel, being bound to a port not within the United States, shall come within the jurisdiction of the United States by reason of being in distress or in stress of weather, or touching at any port of the United States on its voyage to any foreign port or place: Provided, That all Chinese laborers brought on such vessel shall depart with the vessel on leaving port.

SEC. 4. That for the purpose of properly identifying Chinese laborers who were in the United States on the 17th day of November, 1880, or who shall have come into the same before the expiration of [sixty] ninety days next after the passage of this act, and in order to furnish them with the proper evidence of their right to go from and come to the United States of their free will and accord, as provided by the treaty between the United States and China dated November 17, 1880, the collector of customs of the district from which any such Chinese laborer shall depart from the United States shall, in person or by deputy, go on board each vessel having on board any such Chinese [laborers] laborer and cleared or about to sail from his district for a foreign port, and on such vessel make a list of all such Chinese laborers, which shall be entered in registry-books to be kept for that purpose, in which shall be stated the name, age, occupation, last place of residence, physical marks or peculiarities, and all facts necessary for the identification of each of such Chinese laborers, which books shall be safely kept in the custom-house; and every such Chinese laborer so departing from the United States shall be entitled to, and shall receive, free of any charge or cost, upon application therefor, from the collector or his deputy, at the time such list is taken, a certificate, signed by the collector or his deputy and attested by his seal of office, in such form as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, which certificate shall contain a statement of the name, age, occupation, last place of residence, personal description, and facts of identification of the Chinese laborer to whom the certificate is issued, corresponding with the said list and registry in all particulars. In case any Chinese laborer after having received such certificate shall leave such vessel before her departure he shall deliver his certificate to the master of the vessel, and if such Chinese laborer shall [fails] fail to return to such vessel before her departure from port the certificate shall be delivered by the master to the collector of customs for cancellation. The certificate herein provided for shall entitle the Chinese laborer to whom the same is issued to return to and re-enter the United States upon producing and delivering the same to the collector of customs of the district at which such Chinese laborer shall seek to re-enter; and upon delivery of such certificate by such Chinese laborer to the collector of customs at the time of re-entry in the United States, said collector shall cause the same to be filed in the custom-house and duly canceled.

SEC. 5. That any Chinese laborer [living] mentioned in section 4 of this act being in the United States, [under the provisions of the treaty between the United States and China dated November 17, 1880,] and desiring to depart from the United States by land, shall have the right to demand and receive, free of charge or cost, a certificate of identification similar to that provided for in section 4 of this act, to be issued to such Chinese laborers as may desire to leave the United States by water; and it is hereby made the duty of the collector of customs of the district next adjoining the foreign country to which said Chinese laborer desires to go to issue such certificate, free of charge or cost, upon application by such Chinese laborer, and to enter the same upon registry-books to be kept by him for the purpose, as provided for in section 4 of this act.

SEC. 6. That in order to the faithful execution of articles 1 and 2 of the treaty [before] in this act before mentioned, every Chinese person other than a laborer who may be entitled by said treaty and this act to come within the United States, [except such as resided in the United States on the 17th day of November, 1880, or who shall have come within the United States within sixty days next after the passage of this act, shall obtain the permission of the,] and who shall be about to come to the United States, shall be identified as so entitled by the Chinese Government in each case, such identity to be evidenced by a certificate issued [by] under the authority of said government, which certificate shall be in the English language or (if not in the English language) accompanied by a translation into English, [showing,] stating such [permission] right to come, and which certificate shall state the name, title, or official rank, if any, the age, height, and all physical peculiarities, former and present occupation or profession, and place of residence in China of the person to whom the certificate is issued, and that such person is entitled [by] conformably to the treaty in this act mentioned to come within the United States. Such certificate shall be prima facie evidence of the facts set forth therein, and shall be produced to the collector of customs, or his deputy, of the port in the district in the United States at which the person named therein shall arrive.

SEC. 7. That any person who shall knowingly and falsely alter or substitute any name for the name written in such certificate, or forge any such certificate, or knowingly utter any forged or fraudulent certificate, or falsely personate any person named in such certificate, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction [of any offense mentioned in this section the guilty person] thereof shall be fined in a sum not exceeding one thousand dollars, and imprisoned in a penitentiary for a term of not more than five years.

SEC. 8. That the master of any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place shall, at the same time he delivers a manifest of the cargo, and if there be no cargo, then at the time of making a report of the entry of the vessel pursuant to law, in addition to the other matter required to be reported, and before landing, or permitting to land, any Chinese passengers, deliver and report to the collector of customs of the district in which such vessel shall have arrived a separate list of all Chinese passengers taken on board his vessel at any foreign port or place, and all such passengers on board the vessel at that time. Such list shall show the names of such passengers (and if accredited officers of the Chinese Government traveling on the business of that government, or their servants, with a note of such facts,) and the names and other particulars, as shown by [the] their respective certificates, [of other Chinese passengers]; and such list shall be sworn to by the master in the manner required by law in relation to the manifest of the cargo. Any willful refusal or neglect of [the] any such master to comply with the provisions of this section shall incur the same penalties and forfeiture as are provided for a refusal or neglect to report and deliver a manifest of the cargo.

SEC. 9. That before any Chinese passengers are landed from any such vessel, the collector, or his deputy, shall proceed to examine such passengers, comparing the certificates with the list and with the passengers; and no passenger shall be allowed to land in the United States from such vessel in violation of law.

SEC. 10. That every vessel whose master shall knowingly violate any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed forfeited to the United States, and shall be liable to seizure and condemnation in any district of the United States into which such vessel may enter or in which she may be found.

SEC. 11. That any person who shall knowingly bring into, or cause to be brought into, [or shall aid or abet the bringing or coming into,] the United States by land, or who shall [land or aid] knowingly aid or abet the same, or aid or abet the landing in the United States from any vessel, of any Chinese [not authorized by law] person not lawfully entitled to enter the United States, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, [for each person so brought or aided to come into the United States, or so landed,] on conviction thereof, be fined in [the] a sum [of one hundred] not exceeding one thousand dollars and imprisoned for a term not exceeding one year.

SEC. 12. That no Chinese person shall be permitted to enter the United States by land without producing to the proper officer of customs the certificate [herein] in this act required of Chinese persons seeking to land from a vessel. And any Chinese [unlawfully entering] person found unlawfully within the United States, [or who shall have unlawfully entered the United States, in any way, either by land or by water,] shall be caused to be removed therefrom to the [place] country from whence [they] he came, by [the collector of customs of any collection district in which such Chinese may be found,] direction of the President of the United States, and at the cost of the United States, [under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe,] after being brought before some justice, judge, or commissioner of a court of the United States and found to be one not lawfully entitled to be or remain in the United States.

SEC. 13. That this act shall not apply to diplomatic and other officers in the Chinese Government traveling upon the business of that government, whose credentials [in the usual form] shall be taken as equivalent to the certificate in this act mentioned, and shall exempt them and their body and household servants from the provisions of this act as to other Chinese persons.

SEC. 14. That hereafter no State court or court of the United States shall admit Chinese to citizenship; and all laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 15. That the words "Chinese laborers," wherever used in this act, shall be construed to mean both skilled and unskilled laborers and Chinese employed in mining.

POSTAGE ON SECOND-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution of inquiry, to which I think there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, requested to inform this House of the total weight and cost for carrying and the postage collected on second-class mail matter during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, together with his opinion of the propriety of abolishing postage on such mail matter.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The lafter motion was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

Mr. O'NEILL. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill——

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for. The gentleman from Wisconsin, the Chair understands, desires to offer a resolution in connection with an investigation now pending before a committee of the House.

Mr. O'NEILL. I want to know if that call for the regular order was made in earnest, or was made simply upon me. If it was made in earnest and with a view of taking up the regular order of the day, I hope the House will proceed with it. Who demanded the regular order?

The SPEAKER. Several gentlemen have demanded the regular order.

Mr. O'NEILL. Then I presume we will go on with the regular order of the day. Is that the idea?

CHILI-PERUVIAN INVESTIGATION.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I desire to ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, for the passage of the resolution which I send to the desk, authorizing a sub-committee of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to proceed to New York for the purpose of taking the testimony of witnesses in the investigation now pending before that committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that this relates to the business of the House.

Mr. O'NEILL. I had intended to call for the regular order upon every proposition, but this seems to be in the line of the business of the House, and therefore I shall not object to it.

The SPEAKER. The resolution proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to send a subcommittee to New York for the purpose of examining witnesses in the Chili-Peru investigation, heretofore ordered by the House.

The resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HATCH. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HATCH. The regular order having been demanded, I desire to ask if the first business in order under that call is not the unfinished business coming over from the 18th.

The SPEAKER. The regular order would not be the unfinished business coming over from the 18th. That would come up after the morning hour is disposed of. The regular order is the further consideration of the contested-election case, which takes precedence of the morning hour.

Mr. HATCH. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana if he will not give way until the vote can be taken upon the bills now pending as unfinished business, on which a vote has been ordered?

Mr. CALKINS. I will say to the House that I think within an hour, or two hours at furthest, we can close this matter of the contested election, and then the House can take up the other business suggested by the gentleman from Missouri, and devote the remainder of the day to it. I must insist at this time upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER. On yesterday, at the close of the debate upon the election case, the gentleman from Indiana, the chairman of the Committee on Elections, had demanded the previous question on the adoption of the resolution reported by the committee.

Mr. CALKINS. Before that I ask my friend, Judge MOULTON, if he desires now to formally offer the amendment which he suggested, and which properly comes in at this time?

Mr. MOULTON. I move that the resolution attached to the minority report be substituted for the resolution offered by the majority of the committee.

Mr. CALKINS. Then I demand the previous question upon the pending resolution and amendment or substitute.

Mr. HASKELL. He offers the substitute as an amendment to the resolution of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly; but they are to be considered as pending.

Mr. HOOKER. Do I understand the gentleman from Indiana to propose to call the previous question now without allowing further discussion on this side?

Mr. CALKINS. Yes, sir, under the arrangement made yesterday morning in open House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question on the resolutions of the majority of the committee and the substitute therefor offered on the part of the minority.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. CALKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GENERAL RAILROAD INCORPORATION ACT.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me for one moment?

Mr. CALKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas, who desires to give a notice to the House.

Mr. DUNN. I desire to give notice to the House I will at an early day introduce a general railroad incorporation act. There are bills pending to grant franchises to certain individuals in certain parts of the country. I am opposed to the principle of granting such franchises to individuals to hawk and peddle over the country, and as a substitute for those bills I shall offer a general railroad incorporation act.

CONTESTED ELECTION—LYNCH VS. CHALMERS.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, in closing this debate I think it proper to depart for a moment from the consideration of the questions which arise upon the record and which this House is called upon to decide to make a reference, in view of the latitude which the debate has taken heretofore, to a historical fact which, however strange, is nevertheless true. No longer in this House or in the country or from the desk or rostrum since the emancipation of the colored race and the clothing them with the rights of cifizenship do we hear it asserted that a negro occupies some anomalous position not quite human nor entirely animal, but somewhere midway between the two, as a sort of connecting-link. Nor do we hear the metaphysical disquisitions of learned gentlemen upon the essential differences in anatomical structure of that race and the white to show that they do not belong to the human family. Nor do we hear any longer upon the floor of this House, as was once heard, that there was such a difference in the formation of the bones of the African's anatomy, particularly shin-bones, which furnished indubitable proof that he was not of the human species.

Mr. Speaker, the world moves, notwithstanding fallacies and sophistries and false prophecies, prejudice gives way to physical facts; and a remarkable one was seen day before yesterday on this floor, the marked attention of this House was given to one of the representatives of this downtrodden race while he discoursed eloquently, not in the defense of his race, not pleading for special privileges for himself or his people, but demanding at the hands of this Congress equal and exact justice; asking for the enforcement of law and order and an equal chance in the race of life, and declaring his belief in the broader doctrine of the universality of the brotherhood of mankind. The world moves. Fallacies and sophistries are disappearing, and the grand idea which is the corner-stone of this Republic, that all men are created equal before the law is fast becoming the accepted doctrine throughout the land and must forever remain the accepted doctrine of the Republic, and this without reference to race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Except as to the Chinese.

Mr. CALKINS. My friend suggests except as to the Chinese. I say to him that whenever the Chinese shall stop the system of servitude which they have adopted and which has been in vogue ever since the servile labor of that race landed upon these shores, no man upon this side of the Chamber will refuse them the fellowship which we extend to all mankind. It is because we do not believe in servile labor as we did not believe in slavery that we oppose the importation of Chinese coolies.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Are they not free when they come here?

Mr. CALKINS. No, sir; that is the difficulty. They bring their laws with them and remain subject to the Chinese laws, which are enforced among them.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Why does not the Government enforce the law of this country?

Mr. CALKINS. Because it cannot. These people, under fear of assasination, commit perjury in our courts and there is therefore no way to enforce the law. But, Mr. Speaker, I cannot be drawn into a discussion of the Chinese question and called away from the questions involved in this contest. I must pass directly to them.

When I first became a member of Congress I resolved never to vote in this House for the exclusion of a member—no matter what his politics was—if he was qualified and received a majority of the legal votes cast for him in his district. That shall be while I remain a member of this House the one controlling principle which shall guide my action. And in this case if I did not believe from the testimony that the contestant received a majority of the legal votes of his district, I would not have reported in favor of seating him.

There is an old saying that when soothsayers met each other in ancient times and looked in each other's eyes they laughed outright. We cannot shut our eyes to certain facts which are known historically to each one of us as well as if they were proven by the evidence of competent witnesses.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CALKINS. In a moment I will. As I said, we cannot shut our eyes to certain historical facts, and the rule of evidence which controls and has ever controlled this House in the investigation of the elections of its members is not the technical rule applied in the courts. But the fact I desired to call attention to is this: no man can look at that map (holding up a map of the State of Mississippi) and at the lines which show the Shoestring district of that State without making a significant inquiry——

[Several members having requested that the map should be sent to the desk, it was exhibited in front of the Clerk's desk in view of the House.]

The map which I have sent up to the Clerk's desk represents the State of Mississippi as laid off in Congressional districts. And the strip on the west side of Mississippi, which is colored black, represents what is known as the "Shoestring district." It is about four or five hundred miles long, as I am informed, and about forty to fifty miles wide on an average. Now, no man could look at that map and observe the peculiar formation of that sixth district without a very pertinent inquiry being suggested to him at once. That inquiry would be, "Why is this thus?" [Laughter.]

As a part of the history of this country it is well known that that district was so made because it contained a large black population, exceeding by many thousands the white population. I believe each county in the district has a majority of blacks over whites. It is confessedly so made because it eliminates from the rest of the districts of the State a large black vote, and permits them to be felt without the influence of that black vote. It was confessedly made that the district might remain, as it has been familiarly termed, "the black district of Mississippi."

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question in that connection?

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I would inquire of the gentleman if the black lines running across the map which he has sent up to the Clerk's desk indicate the boundaries of the other districts in that State as they are now constituted?

Mr. CALKINS. I am so informed. I will now pass to another question which is equally important in this case. Why is it that all over the State of Mississippi, except in this particular district, there was no complaint made concerning the returns by the officers of election? It was because in all the other districts a majority of votes cast gave the Democratic candidates majorities, and it is not an open question that the vote as cast and returned by the inspectors to the commissioners of election, who afterward supervised and made returns of those votes to the secretary of state, indicated a majority for the contestant.

Mr. HOOKER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly.

Mr. HOOKER. Would it be objectionable to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] if that district, so marked on the map which he has sent up the Clerk's desk, should send a white man to this House instead of a black man?

Mr. CALKINS. The only objection I have to it is the system, known throughout the country as gerrymandering. Such a system is wrong. It was given to us by an old Democrat, and has been improved upon ever since, as this map amply illustrates.

Mr. HOOKER. You have improved upon it in Indiana.

Mr. CALKINS. We have been bad enough in Indiana, but not quite so bad as that map indicates. We can sit at the feet of Mississippi and learn lessons in gerrymandering.

Mr. ATHERTON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly.

Mr. ATHERTON. I would inquire of the gentleman if he has any map showing the late gerrymandering in the State of Ohio in reference to Congressional districts?

Mr. CALKINS. If you have any such map as that, hang it on the outer walls and let it be compared with the one I have produced. If your State has beaten this one, it ought to have a patent.

Mr. ATHERTON. It will compare very unfavorably with this.

Mr. CALKINS. Resuming the thread of my argument where I left off when interrupted, I desire to say that it is not an open question that the votes as cast at the polling places and returned by the inspectors to the commissioners of election showed a majority for the contestant.

Mr. HOOKER. Will the gentleman permit me to make another inquiry?

Mr. CALKINS. I will.

Mr. HOOKER. The gentleman appears to object to the formation of the Congressional districts in the State of Mississippi, and particularly to the one which is connected, county by county, along the Mississippi River, and which is open to communication by steamboats along the whole district. Does the gentleman consider that if that was laid off for the black people it was gerrymandering the State?

Mr. CALKINS. I have passed by that, but I recur to it for the purpose of saying that it is as well known in this country as any other political fact that that district was so laid off and named the "black district" of Mississippi——

Mr. HOOKER. It was therefore not gerrymandering against the colored man.

Mr. CALKINS. It was gerrymandering after all; it was gerrymandering all the black voters as far as possible into one district so that the potency of their votes might not be felt as against the potency of the white votes in the other districts.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Will the gentleman now allow me to ask the question which he said a few moments ago he would permit?

Mr. CALKINS. I will.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. The gentleman from Indiana has just stated and reiterated the statement that the sole inquiry he would make was whether the votes of qualified voters got into the ballot-boxes legally. I would inquire of the gentleman if he has not, within the last ten or fifteen days, signed a report that excludes from the ballot-box in the State of Florida——

Mr. CALKINS. I will come to that.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I want you to come to it right now. Has he not signed a report which excludes from the ballot-box in the State of Florida the votes of naturalized foreigners who were entitled to vote, simply because they did not have their naturalization papers at the polls to exhibit when they voted?

Mr. CALKINS. If my distinguished friend from Georgia will possess his soul in peace, I will give him an ample answer to that question before I finish my argument, an answer which will satisfy even him, I think, however he may determine to act in the matter.

After having stated these facts, that a majority of the votes as cast were confessedly for the contestant, I pass to the next question, which is the law of Mississippi under which these returns are made. I want to examine that question for just a moment.

I do not disagree to the statement of the law as made by the contestee, General Chalmers, or by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] up to a certain point. I may be excused for again repeating these provisions, so that they will be fresh in the mind of every member.

The first provision of the law with reference to the election is: the governor of the State appoints three commissioners of election, who shall be of different political parties. The machinery of the election is put in the hands of the governor through this power to appoint. The commissioners, in turn, appoint three inspectors for each precinct. Then there are provisions as to how the electors may elect, in case these appointees do not serve, &c. These inspectors receive from the clerk, who is the registrar in the first instance, a copy of the registration list (called the poll-book) for the precincts in which the inspectors are appointed. These inspectors, with this poll-book, open the election. They are required by law to keep, during the deposit of the ballots, a poll-list. They are also required to make out a tally-sheet when they count the votes, and to return the ballots, the ballot-boxes, the poll-books, the poll-lists, and the tally-sheets to the commissioners of election on a day subsequent to the election.

Mr. CARLISLE. The gentleman is mistaken; they are not required by law to keep a tally-list while the vote is being taken.

Mr. CALKINS. I did not say that.

Mr. CARLISLE. They are required to keep a list of the voters.

Mr. CALKINS. A list of the voters; the gentleman is right. These are returned to the commissioners of election. The law thus provides that the poll-book or the poll-list and the ballot-box shall be returned by the commissioners to the clerk of the circuit court. Here comes the difference between the view I have taken of the law and the view which my friends on the other side so strenuously contend for.

I am going to leave this matter for the present at this point, for thus far we agree. When the ballots, the tally-list, the tally-sheets, the poll-book, and the ballot-box get back into the hands of the commissioners of election——

Mr. CARLISLE. And the list of voters.

Mr. CALKINS. And the list of voters. We all agree that of those the ballot-box and poll-books are to be delivered to the clerks of the circuit court——

Mr. MOULTON. In what section of the law does the gentleman find any requirement that the ballot-box shall go to the clerk of the court?

Mr. CALKINS. It is the registration law.

Mr. CARLISLE. I do not agree that the ballot-box goes to the clerk.

Mr. MOULTON. Only the poll-list.

Mr. CALKINS. The law is that the ballot-box shall go as well. I read from section 127:

The ballot-boxes shall be delivered with the keys thereof to the clerk of the circuit court for preservation, and he shall keep them for future use, &c.

Mr. MOULTON. Those are the empty boxes.

Mr. CALKINS. My friend says that they are the empty boxes. I will come to that in a moment. I will ask him to possess his soul in patience till I reach that point. I am going to drop this question now and take it up further on, because we agree up to this point.

Mr. Speaker, I believe with my friend from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] who spoke yesterday, that neither this House nor its Committee on Elections is or ever has been bound by the technical rules of the admission of evidence such as is applied in the courts. I announce this as a principle settled in the early Congresses, followed all the way down, and acted upon not only by the present Committee on Elections but by every one that has preceded it. Can I make that assertion good? I will commence with the last Congress, because some gentlemen now here were members of the Committee on Elections in that Congress and followed the rule which I now state. In the case of Donnelly vs. Washburn what did the Committee do? It is true I did not agree with the majority in that case, because I thought the evidence wholly immaterial.

I did not dispute the fact that the committee had a right to take such evidence as they did; but I disputed the question of its materiality. But what did the majority of the committee do? On page 19 of the report in the last House, a report signed by all the Democratic members, I believe, except one or two—my friend from Mississippi [Mr. MANNING] was the author of the report—the committee said that they would examine "contemporaneous history" for the purpose of determining any question involved in the election. They put into that report an article which appeared in a political newspaper on or about the day on which the election was held; they copied it bodily, although it was not in evidence at all. They considered that a part of the "contemporaneous history" of the election; so they embodied it in their report, and asked the House to unseat a man upon what they thus called "contemporaneous history," a political article from a newspaper! Referring to this article as "contemporaneous history," they say:

It shows it was understood at that time, before any contest could have been contemplated by the contestant, that the numbering of the ballots would result in the intimidation of the workingmen who were in favor of Donnelly.

Observe that, as a link in a chain to prove intimidation, they inserted in their report a newspaper article. I then said that it had no bearing on the case; I say so still. But they, in that case, followed what they understood to be a rule established by the House long ago. There are a great many cases referred to in the report, to which I call attention.

When this country as well as this House was in the midst of an excitement such as was never witnessed before, and I trust to God will never be witnessed again—in the days of the slavery agitation and just before secession, as will be remembered especially by the older members of the House—the celebrated contested election of Vallandigham vs. Campbell arose.

It was one of the historical landmarks, one of the mile-stones, which the Democratic party has planted as it passed along on its pro-slavery road. But, sir, it announces certain principles of law, which were followed then and which have been followed ever since. Looking over that debate I find a speech made by Hon. James Wilson from Indiana—and a more eloquent man never represented any part of that State—against that report, and his line of argument and reasons against it are nearly the same given yesterday by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] in behalf of the contestee. The same points were made then with vigor and with great clearness, precisely as the gentleman made them yesterday.

Hon. L. Q. C. LAMAR, now an honored Senator from Mississippi, made a speech in favor of that majority report. Here is what he says—but, before I read it, let me state the point involved in that case. The taking of testimony under the law had closed. Sixty days had shut out the giving of any further testimony by either party. Campbell came forward and asked to take further testimony. The committee said no, and shut the door against it. Then Mr. Vallandigham, nearly eight months after, came forward and asked to prove an important fact, namely, the tabulated returns showing the vote as given for each candidate as returned to the secretary of state, which testimony he had omitted, and he filed with the Committee on Elections a certificate of the election as compiled in the secretary of state's office under the broad seal of the State of Ohio. It was objected to. The minority said you cannot offer any further testimony as the time has closed. You refused Campbell the right to take testimony when he asked it, and now you ask that Mr. Vallandigham shall be permitted to supply this important link in his testimony without which he cannot be seated.

Now, what did Mr. LAMAR say? He said in effect this House was not hampered by the legal technical rules of evidence, and that the law which prescribed sixty days for taking testimony did not apply to such records and such evidence as might be authenticated by the seal of officers such as the secretary of state.

And that is the rule, Mr. Speaker, we followed in the Campbell-Cannon case this session. My friend from Iowa, [Mr. THOMPSON,] and a braver, nobler man does not live anywhere, insisted strenuously the rule was wrong and that we ought to shut out the certificate of the secretary of the Territory of Utah because Mr. Cannon did not put it in evidence at all, but sent it through the Clerk of the House. We said no, that a minority of votes in this country cannot elect anybody, and we will look to it to see what is the truth.

Mr. McLANE. The gentleman from Indiana does not do justice, I think, to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. CALKINS. I am coming to his exact language in a little while. I have it before me now.

Mr. McLANE. Before you comment on it——

Mr. CALKINS. These are my comments, and if they are not right, if they are not proper, I stand corrected as to anything which is not properly deduced from what I read. Here is what Mr. LAMAR said. I read from a part of his speech, as copied in contested-election cases.

Perhaps I ought to read first from the report on that subject. It was objected, he said, in the report, drawn probably by Mr. HARRIS, that the committee ought not to receive and consider the abstract of votes returned to the office of the secretary of state for the sitting member and the contestant, because the document was not obtained within the sixty days limited for taking testimony. I do not read the whole of it, because it is too long. It is as follows:

Congress has, in repeated instances, where the conduct of the returning officers was irregular or the returns of the election informally made out, waived the irregularities and informalities, provided the election itself was fairly and legally conducted; but these precedents are all based upon the broad and obvious distinction existing between the returns of an election and the election itself. The election is the choosing of their Representative by the people in accordance with the law, while the returns are the mere evidence of the result as furnished by the officers, consisting of certificates of boards and commissions. The election is the great fact of which the returns are the mere legal evidence. Now, these returns may be informal, the acts of the officers may be irregular, Congress may set them aside or waive them without affecting the validity of the election itself.

This is the doctrine I stand upon, the "election itself," and not on mere informalities of returning officers.

Mr. McLANE. I have followed the gentleman from Indiana in his argument, as I did the argument of the gentleman from New Jersey——

Mr. CALKINS. Before the gentleman from Maryland proceeds, I wish to insert in this connection the remainder of this portion of the argument of Mr. LAMAR in this contested-election case to which I am now referring. He goes on to say:

The fact of the election still exists, although Congress may ascertain its existence by evidence other than the returns.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. In this connection let me ask the gentleman from Indiana if that had been a return by the bailiff——

Mr. CALKINS. I will hear the gentleman's question as soon as the gentleman from Maryland concludes.

Mr. McLANE. I do not think that there is any difference of opinion between the gentleman from Indiana and those to whom he refers on this side of the House as to the main fact of our power over such cases as a court having the fullest jurisdiction; and that we are not bound, if you please, by the technical rules of evidence that a court at common law has chosen to prescribe for itself; but just as courts of common law have prescribed for themselves technical rules of evidence, so we must have rules of evidence of our own for the purpose of satisfying our own conscience in such cases, and not assume to exercise a mere capricious and personal discretion, as our judgment in the premises should be a judicial judgment. Now, the gentleman from Indiana has stated clearly that it must be a legal vote that should be counted to constitute a majority.

Mr. CALKINS. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. McLANE. And that if a man is elected by a majority of votes which are not legal he would not report in favor of him.

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly not.

Mr. McLANE. Now, we ask for nothing more.

Mr. CALKINS. My friend from Maryland knows that I cannot yield to him for an argument.

Mr. McLANE. Only a moment. I merely wish to state a general proposition. Rules of evidence made for our guidance, though not the technical rules at common law, must be such as to satisfy our conscience and our judicial judgments. In other words, that in rejecting a vote the evidence on which we act must be of such a character as to satisfy our consciences that we are acting properly in our judicial character.

Mr. CALKINS. I agree to that.

Mr. McLANE. A word more. If there be a majority of votes cast for Lynch which were illegal votes and which if thrown out a majority of legal votes would belong to Mr. Chalmers, then you are bound to seat Chalmers, although Lynch may have had a majority of votes.

Mr. CALKINS. Nobody disputes that proposition. I quite agree with the gentleman. The only thing we will be likely to disagree upon is as to what are legal votes in the first place, and second, as to the evidence of receiving or counting them.

Mr. McLANE. I make no point now upon the technical character of the evidence. I only want the conscience of the gentleman and the judicial mind of the House to be satisfied that they are legal votes under the laws of the State and the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CALKINS. Now I will hear the question of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Suppose that return to which the gentleman from Indiana referred a moment since had been the return of the bailiff instead of the clerk, does the gentleman hold that that would have been legal evidence?

Mr. CALKINS. My friend must not anticipate my argument. I am coming to that subject in a moment, and then I will satisfy him, I think, on that point.

Now, in the investigation of these election cases I have been controlled by but one motive, and that was to look to see who had the most legal votes, and I am not in favor and never will be in favor of setting up any technical objection made by a returning board which suppresses or overturns the voice of the people as expressed at the ballot-box.

My whole object has been to sift out the truth and to be guided by the legitimate choice of the people. It is objected that the precincts in Bolivar County should not be counted, and this is the weak point in the case. Nobody knew that better than the gentleman from Kentucky. He knew it at once, and spent his force upon the weak point. He made his strong point against the testimony on the election held in Bolivar County. He asked, and I undertook to give him at the time he asked for it, the evidence upon which the vote was counted by the committee. Bolivar County held an election which it was admitted in argument before the committee by Mr. Lynch in person and affirmed by the contestee in person, that it was a peaceful, quiet election. Both sides affirmed it. There was no dispute about it; it was an admitted fact, and we started with that admission as the basis of our report. There was a peaceful, quiet, calm election held in that county. Men went up to the ballot-box and deposited their votes without question, as they had a right to do. The officers counted them as it was their bounden duty to do. They sent the count of the votes together with the tally-lists and all the papers and the ballots to the commissioners as the law required. What did the commissioners do?

They said, "We have all of those papers which have been sent up, but we throw those ballots out." Why? Because they did not make, a certificate, mark you, of the returns. What is the certificate? You will find a copy of it inserted in the record, a few lines, in which they simply say, we certify that the above is a full, true return, &c., and sign it.

Mr. CARLISLE. But they did not sign anything.

Mr. CALKINS. They did not sign the certificate, but, mark you, the commissioners rejected the vote on that account, and do not say they rejected the votes for any other reason.

The certificates are made a part of the contestee's answer, in which he affirms that they were thrown out, and properly. He admits the vote was cast but was not counted.

Anything that is not denied is admitted. You will find it in the seventh paragraph of the answer of the contestee. Read it. I have not time to read it. In that answer he sets forth the very return which was afterward put in evidence, and makes it a part of his answer. That is not a denial that the vote was cast. It is simply a denial that the officers of the election did not do their duty and thereby these electors are to be deprived of their right to participate in the election.

That is all I am going to say about that. Mark you, the whole force of the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky was not launched against the truth of that fact, but against the manner in which it was proved; not against the thing itself, but against the approaches by which you get there. The whole thing was launched against the machinery, and not against the immutable fact which is undisputed.

Mr. CARLISLE. Will the gentleman allow me just there? I know how disagreeable it is to be interrupted, but I think he will pardon me for a moment.

Mr. CALKINS. I am quite willing to be interrupted by the gentleman.

Mr. CARLISLE. The statement made by the commissioners of election to which the gentleman refers, and which seems to be incorporated in the answer of the contestee to the notice of the contestant, does not show that the inspectors and clerks of election signed any paper; and it does not show there was a single vote cast for Lynch for Congress or for Chalmers for Congress, but that they found in the ballot-boxes so many Democratic and so many Republican votes; that is, so many tickets with the Democratic heading to them and so many with the Republican heading.

Mr. CALKINS. My friend from Kentucky has simply anticipated me in what I was to say. It has been held repeatedly that where evidence was given in a court of law by a voter in a contested-election case to the effect that "I voted the Democratic ticket," or "I voted the Republican ticket," or "the Greenback ticket," that that was prima facie evidence that the elector voted for every candidate whose name appeared on the regular ticket, and the burden shifted on the other party to show that such was not the fact.

Now, how is it here? The commissioners say, "We find so many Democratic votes and so many Republican votes, and we reject them because the officers of election did not sign a certificate." That is what they say.

This is only a question as to the convincing character of the evidence. You need not argue that with me. You cannot go to any man outside the Hall of this House, I do not care who, and say to him, "Look here, these fellows down in Mississippi threw out forty-five Democratic tickets and three hundred and eleven Republican tickets at that precinct. Lynch and Chalmers were the only men running for Congress. What do you say?" He would say in fairness at once those tickets ought to be counted for Lynch and Chalmers respectively.

Mr. CARLISLE. But the gentleman misapprehended my argument. My argument was that these commissioners had nothing before them to enable them to declare who put these ballots in the box.

Mr. CALKINS. Bless your heart, it is to be presumed that the inspectors did their duty, and when they sent these tickets up and these tally-sheets it is to be presumed they sent the lawful ones. If sheets were informal it was the duty of the commissioners—to do what? Suppress the vote? No, correct the informalities. If they did not, we ought to do it. If we did not we would be a stench in the nostrils of all right-thinking people.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me one word?

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly.

Mr. REAGAN. In case of a contested election the contestant, as I understand the rule, has to prove either by the poll-books or by proof aliunde that he was elected, and the burden remains on him to prove it. It seems to me, therefore, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] is not justified in assuming another fact, that is that there was a Democratic and a Republican ticket, and by that assumption throwing on the contestee the burden of proof.

Mr. CALKINS. There could be better proof. I have no doubt he might have made better proof. But that is not the question. When he makes the proof he does what are we to do with it? Are we to shut our eyes to it and thereby "immolate truth, justice, and law because some technical rule has erected the altar and decreed the sacrifice?" However slight the proof it stands uncontradicted. If it is not true, the other party could have shown so easily its falsehood. That is my answer to that.

Issaquena County: It is objected that although the commissioners of election in this county certify the number of votes, they do not say what kind of votes they were, whether Democratic or Republican. The minority of the committee object, and say because these commissioners of election have not separated these votes and said there were so many for Chalmers and so many for Lynch, so many Democratic and so many Republican, therefore you cannot count them. But we find in the record—what? A certificate from the clerk, under the seal of the chancery clerk of Issaquena County, Mississippi. And here I may pause just a moment to say that by the executive documents and records of Mississippi, a copy of which I hold in my hand, and which we may always consider under the head of county officers, I find that Richard Griggs, the man who made this certificate, was elected and commissioned in 1880 for so many years, I think two, and that he is the circuit court clerk and the chancery clerk of the county. Here it is on page 60 of Miscellaneous Documents of Mississippi.

So, now, whatever virtue there is in my argument, it is not without historical evidence which the committee could receive, and my friends admit it, in the fact that Richard Griggs combined in his own person two offices, namely, that of circuit clerk and that of chancery clerk.

Mr. CARLISLE. And I assumed that he did.

Mr. CALKINS. Now, we find a certificate here, which I might as well read, for this is a technical objection, and if gentlemen take the sword they must perish by the sword.

Mr. CARLISLE. Suppose that Griggs had been circuit clerk and also constable, and that he had certified to this as constable. Would that certificate of his as constable be sufficient, and would that committee say it was good evidence on the ground that he was also circuit clerk, even admitting that his certificate as circuit clerk would have been sufficient evidence?

Mr. CALKINS. I will come to that. I will turn to the certificate which has been objected to and read it. Mark you, the exact point is that the commissioners, as certifying officers, having certified to a fact, and in the certification of that fact having made it so blind that you cannot say for whom these votes were cast, therefore, in resorting to other testimony in the record, (which our friends claim is not competent testimony and that it cannot be taken in order to ascertain how to divide that vote) the committee did wrong because it was not evidence that the committee could consider. That is the point. Now, we look to the law, which we have seen says that the ballot-boxes and this copy from the registration list shall be returned by the commissioners of election to the clerk.

Mr. MOULTON. Will the gentleman allow me just a moment right there?

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly.

Mr. MOULTON. My friend falls into a fatal error. There is not a particle of law in Mississippi that warrants the return of the ballot-boxes to the clerks.

Mr. CALKINS. I have just read it from the Code of Mississippi.

Mr. MOULTON. Look at section 126.

Mr. CALKINS. I did not refer to section 126. It is to section 127. I will read it again from the Revised Code of Mississippi, so that there can be no mistake about it. Here is the law:

After each election the ballot-boxes, &c.

I then turn to another section of the Mississippi Code, section 1632, which I will read. That section says:

All public officers in this State having the charge or custody—

Now, my friend will say that means the legal charge or the legal custody. I agree to that. But it may not be by positive statute. If it is inferential it is just the same—

All public officers in this State having the charge or custody of any public books, records, or writings—are authorized to certify copies of the same; which copies shall be received in evidence in all cases where the original would be evidence.

That is pretty broad—

Now, if we had here before us the original papers upon which these inspectors made up this record, would that be evidence of the fact so as to enable us to determine how these votes should be divided between these two candidates? And that is all we are looking after. What we are looking for is something to determine how the votes should be divided; for we have the fact of how many votes were polled.

Now, would the original papers upon which these inspectors made up this record be evidence of the division of votes between these two candidates? There is no question that they would be.

But you do not launch your objection against the fact that such evidence would aid us to divide the vote, but you object to the manner in which that fact is proved. Now, I say that the ballot-boxes coming by law into the clerk's office, and there being an absence of any law saying that these commissioners or anybody else should preserve these papers, such a construction of that law ought to be given as will preserve these papers for use in just such cases as this.

Mr. CARLISLE. But these were not the ballots.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not care if they were not the ballots; they were a part of the means by which that election was conducted, and under the law of Mississippi, heretofore referred to, it was the custom to have the ballot-boxes contain all these things when it went to the registrar.

Mr. MOULTON. How does my friend construe section 139 of the Mississippi Code?

Mr. CALKINS. You will find by reference to another section of the law that these commissioners acted for only ten days. They are temporary officers; they only have an official life for ten days. In the very case before us, which I will discuss in a moment, they became functus officio after they had performed their duty. They do not keep the records. The election papers should go somewhere for preservation. And I say that by necessary inference they go into the hands of the circuit clerk, and he, being the legal custodian of them, can certify them. If the original was here it would be evidence of the manner in which the votes should be divided, and the certified copies are equal evidence. Anything else would lead simply to an absurdity.

Now, that is all I have to say on that point. If any gentleman has so tender a conscience that it will not allow him to receive that as legal evidence, then let him purge his conscience by voting the other way. I do not ask him to vote with me.

I come now to the next precinct seriously attacked, the precinct of Kingston, in Adams County. Now, I admit that I was in favor of throwing out that box entirely. I think now as a lawyer, applying the well-known rules of law, that this box ought to go out, and I will tell you why. As to this box we have this state of facts: first, the only thing on the part of the contestee is the return of the sworn officer. On the other hand we have the testimony of five witnesses with reference to the conduct of the election there. I will admit, as any man must, that a partisan looks at testimony through somewhat jaundiced eyes. I admit also that if I were in the place of my friends on the other side I might conscientiously come to the same conclusion about this that they do.

We all have these deep-seated prejudices which we cannot shake off, do the best we can. But there stands the fact uncontradicted; five witnesses testify, first, that this box before the count was completed was twice taken some distance from the place where the voting was going on; that the aperture into which the ballots were put was not sealed. The law of Mississippi requires that this aperture shall be sealed during any recess or adjournment. That is one fact.

Secondly, these witnesses testify that there were from three hundred and fifty to three hundred and sixty pronounced Republicans at that precinct.

Thirdly, one of these witnesses testifies that at that poll on that day he tallied one hundred and sixty Republican voters whose tickets he saw on his private tally-list, and that as the rest of them came up and voted they said, "Give me a Lynch ticket," and put it in. Now, it is objected that this is hearsay evidence.

Mr. ATHERTON. Let me correct the gentleman. They did not say "Give me a Lynch ticket;" they simply said "Lynch."

Mr. CALKINS. Some of them would say "Lynch;" and the testimony also shows that they came into the room of the witness and said they wanted a Lynch ticket, and then as they came up to the polls they would say "Lynch" as they voted. Now, if you will look at the Vallandigham case and the other cases you will find it settled that what a man says at the time he votes has always been held to be competent evidence as the confession of a party interested. This is the ground upon which the admission of such evidence was put in the Vallandigham case.

Thus the proof is, first, that there were 350 or 360 Republicans in that precinct; secondly, that they voted that day; thirdly, that 160 of them voted open tickets and the rest said "Lynch" when they came up and presented their tickets. Yet we have this surprising result—that only 159 votes are returned there for Mr. Lynch, and the balance for Mr. Chalmers.

Now, I say that upon this uncontradicted testimony that box ought to go out. We did not throw out the box because it makes a difference of only a few votes, about 60, either way. We let it stand, correcting it according to the evidence of the witnesses. The House may do as it pleases on this question. I do not care whether the box goes out or stands.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Did not the witness say that the only persons he heard say "Lynch" were three or four?

Mr. CALKINS. Oh, no; he said he knew how "all but three or four voted." I will, in order to satisfy the gentleman, read from the testimony of H. B. Fowles. He testified as follows:

With the exception, possibly, of three or four, the whole of that 350 came into the room and up to me with open tickets. My knowledge of the number is derived from the fact that they came up and showed me the tickets.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I pass from that point to the next question. It is seriously contended that we are concluded in this case, because the supreme court of Mississippi has decided the question; that under the former rulings of this House and under the general rule that in construing the local statutes of a State, or the constitution of a State, the Federal courts and this body will follow the construction given by the State tribunals. It is said we are concluded because the supreme court of Mississippi has decided this question. Before discussing that legal proposition, let me give a plain, unvarnished history of the case, relied upon as it appears in the record.

On the 2d of November, 1880, the election now being contested was held; that is undisputed. On the 16th of November, 1880, Mr. Lynch filed his bill in the chancery court of Mississippi, asking that the secretary of state be enjoined from making a certificate to the governor whereby the contestee in this case should receive his prima facie title. That was denied on the 17th of November. On the 22d day of November, 1880—I ask gentlemen to observe these dates, because they are significant—Mr. Lynch served upon the contestee a copy of his notice of contest. On the 9th of December, 1880—nineteen or twenty days afterward—the district attorney of Tunica County, one of the counties in the upper portion of the "Shoestring district," as you will see it exhibited at the desk, filed his petition in the circuit court of that county asking that the commissioners of election be ordered to reassemble and reject five hundred and six ballots cast for Mr. Lynch in this case.

Why? Because he said they had the same marks on them which are complained of in this contest. I use this expression—he did not use it—to call attention to the printers' dashes on the tickets; they are the same. When that decision was rendered I cannot ascertain. It has not any date; but that it was rendered soon after being commenced both by the circuit court and by the supreme court is matter of history because we had it here before the assembling of Congress.

While I remain a member of this House, whether short or long, wherever the State courts have construed their election laws so that they have become a part of the system of the election laws in a State, I will follow them.

I repeat it, wherever the State tribunals have construed their election laws so they have become a part of the system I will follow that construction, even though I cannot agree to the reasoning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MOULTON. I move that the gentleman be allowed to proceed without limitation as to time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection and it is so ordered.

Mr. CALKINS. I thank the gentleman and the House. I will try to be as brief as possible.

There were certain jurisdictional questions necessary in that case which must appear before the court had jurisdiction. The court remarked, as it well might, that this House was the proper tribunal to decide the question of those ballots. Let me read in the presence of this House what that court said in reference to it:

The House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States is the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and the courts of the State have nothing to do with it whatever.

Why, then, did they proceed to construe the law. Because, as the eminent judge said, it had been suggested from the bar that some officers had been arrested, and the public was interested, and so the court would construe the law on the request of the attorney-general.

It was done without argument. There was not a brief filed on either side. There was no oral argument on either side, all of which is admitted and in the record. Lynch was no party to the record, and could not be heard. No man opposed to the theory as set out in the bill and admitted by the demurrer was heard. The court itself said it had no jurisdiction of the very question at issue.

What was the real question in issue? You gather that by the fact alleged in the petition. What is the fact alleged? That on the 2d of November an election was held in that county for member of Congress, and that 506 marked ballots were deposited and counted for Lynch, in violation of law. They asked the court to compel the county commissioners to reassemble and reject those votes. The court, in its opinion, stated three questions, and my ingenious friend from Ohio [Mr. ATHERTON] made one of the strongest arguments imaginable, founded upon the questions as stated.

He contended it was no matter how the court arrived at the conclusion it did if the facts properly presented the questions decided, and he said they were because the court had stated the three questions as indicated. The difficulty with my friend's argument is that we are not bound by the manner in which the court presented the questions, and I deny it presented them in the proper way. I claim the first question the court had to decide was by the section of the Mississippi law upon which it is claimed this action is predicated, Are there proper parties here to give us jurisdiction? That is the first thing they had to decide, and if there were no proper parties that was the end of the case.

Mr. Speaker, it is a solecism for a court to say it would decide so and so, and this is the opinion of the court if it had a proper defendant, but the court finds the defendant is dead, and therefore the court does not do anything but give an opinion of what the law would be if the defendant was not dead. That is what the court did here. It found these commissioners had no legal existence; that as officers they were functi officio, and the relator could not proceed against them at all, and the court therefore said, we find the law to be so and so, but we have no proper parties here; and that was the end of the case.

The jurisdictional question decided the whole case, and whatever else the judges said may be treated as obiter dictum, as the opinion of learned gentlemen. It is not the opinion of the court of Mississippi except as to that one point.

Mr. SPRINGER. Do I understand the gentleman to hold that where a court decides it has no jurisdiction in a particular case, that its reasons for that opinion are not to be held as an opinion of that court?

Mr. CALKINS. I cannot go over that ground again, and I beg my friend from Illinois to allow me to proceed as I am nearly exhausted and wish to conclude as soon as possible.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then, if the gentleman is so nearly exhausted, will he not let me call attention to the position held by the late President, Mr. Garfield, upon this subject, while he is resting?

Mr. CALKINS. I cannot yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SPRINGER. I shall occupy but a very little time.

Mr. CALKINS. Very well, I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. SPRINGER. In the Louisiana case before the electoral commission President Garfield, then one of the commissioners, uses this language:

> He says the Supreme Court in the case of Bonner vs. Lynch, twenty-fifth Louisiana Annual Reports, 268, say: "The Legislature has seen proper to lodge the power to decide who has or who has not been elected in the returning board. It might have conferred that power upon the courts, but it did not. Whether the law be good or bad, it is our duty to obey its provisions and not to legislate. Having no power to revise the action of the board of returning officers, we have nothing to do with the reasons or grounds upon which they arrived at their conclusion."

It was held there that the court had no jurisdiction to determine who was elected, as that jurisdiction was conferred upon the returning board of that State.

Mr. CALKINS. That is very probable under the law of the State.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, the late President, referring to that opinion, said: "The court declares the law valid, and that alone ends the controversy;" showing that the decision, in his opinion, was binding upon the Congress of the United States, upon the electoral commission, and upon all persons.

Mr. CALKINS. Upon another point in the argument I will come to that if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me to send this up and have it read?

Mr. CALKINS. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no doubt that it will improve the argument of the gentleman to permit this opinion of the late President to be inserted in connection with his remarks.

Mr. CALKINS. I have no doubt that my speech will not be improved by anything that the gentleman from Illinois will see proper to interject.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not offer my own opinion, but that of the late distinguished President of the United States, who used this language in that connection:

> That the construction given to a statute of a State by its supreme court is binding upon all other States and upon the United States; and that for all practical purposes the construction so given becomes as much a part of the statute as though the language of the court were incorporated into the text of the law.

Mr. CALKINS. Evidently so; but as I will come to that, as I have stated, during the course of my remarks, I think I can convince the gentleman that the point he takes is fallacious as applied to this case. I do not deny the proposition in general, but the question discussed there is referable to another clause of the Constitution not now under consideration, and it cannot be made applicable in this case.

Now, as to this interesting decision of the court of Mississippi, I say that if the supreme court of that State, in cases where it shall have jurisdiction, adheres in the future to the doctrine announced and makes it a part of the system of elections in that State, and I should be a member in the House, however much I should dissent from it, I should feel compelled to follow it.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. How can they get jurisdiction, the fact remaining always that we are the judges?

Mr. CALKINS. Under this election law, in cases which arise in the State between contestants for State offices. Of course State courts can never usurp our functions as to contests for seats on this floor, but we would or ought to apply the law as construed by the State courts when their decisions are made in cases where they have undoubted jurisdiction. This cannot be the rule where the court deals in obiter, and in cases where by the Constitution they are not allowed to decide.

The next question the supreme court of the State attempt to decide is that these dashes upon the ballots are such marks as make them obnoxious to the law. An enunciation of such a doctrine coming from a source less high than the supreme court of Mississippi would be by me considered as of little weight. The universal doctrine throughout the United States is opposed to this decision. The court do not cite a single authority in harmony with this opinion.

There is not one that has been brought to our notice. They overturn and reverse the rule declared in 47 Mississippi, where the court say that all election laws as to the electors are to be construed liberally, and as to the officers and their duties under them mandatory. The Supreme Court in the Oglesby case reverse that rule and say in effect that the law made for the protection of the voter shall be construed strictly, and if he does not comply with everything which the letter of the law requires his ballot shall be void.

That I hold to be a reversal of all the doctrines of elections known in the jurisprudence of this country. The furthest, in my judgment, that a construction of this law can go would be to make the voter responsible for the intent in all cases where there is not a palpable violation of the law. That is as far as we go in civil actions.

Now, I admit that it is competent for the Legislature to say that any distinguishing mark which is distinctly such shall be prohibited and the ballot containing it rejected. That is competent. Everybody knows what that means. Such laws are an inhibition against spread-eagles, flags, portraits, different tinted paper, and the like, whereby the weak, unlettered, and ignorant may be detected in voting and the secrecy of the ballot destroyed. For the purpose of preventing that and to make the ballot secret, thereby protecting the weak, these sort of laws are enacted.

It is on that principle alone that they can be maintained as reasonable regulations. But the supreme court of Mississippi say that this law must be construed strictly against the voter; and though a ticket contains what is confessedly punctuation marks, that they are of themselves such marks or devices as make them obnoxious to the law. It is well, Mr. Speaker, that this decision stands alone in the jurisprudence of this country, and I cannot bring myself to the belief that the opinion will stand long even as the law of that State. It is so subversive of every principle of right, honesty, justice, and fair dealing in elections that the universal voice of the people of this country will and do condemn it.

One thing more, Mr. Speaker. The extreme limit, in my judgment, ought to be that nothing is obnoxious to that law which is necessary or proper in the mechanical art of printing, but that if anything was used for the purpose of being a mark, such purpose shall remain a question of fact, to be tried as other questions of fact are tried.

Mr. HOOKER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly.

Mr. HOOKER. Is there not a uniform, unbroken line of authority in all the States and in the Supreme Court that with respect to the revenue laws and laws like this law in Mississippi and Ohio and Maine, and other States, the question of intention never enters, and that if there is an infraction that is regarded as a violation of the law?

Mr. CALKINS. If there is such a violation of the law that the use of the thing, whatever it may be, is palpably within the prohibition—yes. If, however, as in this case, only such arts and appliances as are known to the art of printing and as are generally used throughout the country are made use of—no. You cannot take up a newspaper, or a printed bill of this House, or anything else from a printing office that has not these same dashes upon them.

Mr. HOOKER. If an ordinary mark such as is used in a printing office in printing a public document is a designation and device by which the ticket may be known then is it not embraced in the prohibition of the law?

Mr. CALKINS. No; because if you go that far you would have to say that unless all the names were of the same length, unless the head of the ticket and all the names on the ticket were in the same type, so that there could be absolutely seen on the ticket nothing to distinguish it from the other, there would be a violation of the law. But when the head of the ticket, the length of the names, the difference of type made use of are allowed by the law, then I say you cannot claim that certain punctuation marks which belong to the mechanical art of printing are obnoxious to it and cannot be used. The heading, a friend suggests to me, is a designation of itself.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. That is allowed by the statute, and so is the whole printing. What is allowed is right; what is not allowed is wrong.

Mr. CALKINS. But would the gentleman say because the statute did not say you should not have a period or a comma, that those would be distinguishing marks? My friend from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] would not go that far, nor my friend from Georgia, [Mr. HAMMOND.] And if you are to determine between different kinds of punctuation marks, where are you to draw the line? Drawing the line where you do you run into an absurdity.

Mr. Speaker, I say these ballots ought to be counted, and if there is any gentleman upon the floor of the House who believes that these ballots are obnoxious to that law within its true intent and meaning, unfettered and unhampered, as I claim we are, by anything that comes to us as a part of the election system of that State, I say let him vote against this report. But as for me, I have no doubt, none whatever, of the legality of these ballots under the law of Mississippi, and I believe it is a part of the duty of this House to so assert, especially when the very case which was to conclude us was a case growing out of this very election after this contest was pending.

Mr. ROBESON. The claim is, the higher court should be bound by the decision of the lower one when reviewing it.

Mr. CALKINS. I make one of these tickets a part of my remarks. It is as follows:

EXHIBIT A.—JERRY TAYLOR.

Republican National Ticket.

For President,

JAMES A. GARFIELD.

—o—

For Vice President,

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

For Electors for President and Vice President,

HON. WILLIAM R. SPEARS,

HON. R. W. FLOURNOY,

DR. J. M. BYNUM,

HON. J. T. SETTLE,

CAPT. M. K. MISTER, JR.,

DR. R. H. MONTGOMERY,

JUDGE R. H. CUNY,

HON. CHARLES W. CLARKE.

—o—

For Member of the House of Representatives from the 6th Congressional District.

JOHN R. LYNCH.

The marks and devices complained of are those dashes which divide the head of the ticket from the name of the President, and those dividing the name of the electors from the name of the member of Congress.

I now pass, Mr. Speaker, to answer some of the observations which my friends on the other side made, running hurriedly over them but answering such of them as I think deserve a passing notice in the limited time that I have to review them. And in the first place, in reply to all that part of the attack made by gentlemen on the other side upon Mr. Lynch in regard to the tickets having been printed by him or with his knowledge or consent, for the purpose of being marked with the intent of having distinguishing marks upon them, I say that if human testimony can establish anything it establishes the fact that Mr. Lynch, fearing something of this in the future, knowing what he had to cope with, was particularly anxious that his ticket should be a lawful ticket, strongly within the law, and nothing else.

So thoroughly was he permeated with the idea that there would be some trouble in the future, that he did not trust his own party friends, but went to Democrats who were personal friends, though political enemies, and he said to them, "All I want is a ticket within that law." They sat down together just as reasonably prudent men would do and talked over the law together; and he was assured by Mr. Wright, of the Vicksburgh Herald, and other gentlemen who printed his tickets, that they would print them within that law and would defend them from successful assaults.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. He went to a printer instead of to a lawyer to learn the law.

Mr. CALKINS. But they said they had taken advice; and they had printed Democratic tickets, and did print them, and they were voted in Issaquena County, according to the testimony of Mr. Myers, with just precisely the same marks upon them as were upon Mr. Lynch's tickets.

They said that they would print a ticket which was not obnoxious to the law; said it not only then but when they were put on the stand afterward; and the ticket was put into their hands and they were asked, "Do you consider that a marked ticket?" And they answered, "No." They testified as to the art and guild of printing. They testified, "We say that is a plain ticket without marks." And when Mr. Chalmers called Mr. Charles Winkley, he testified in effect the same thing; that they were plain tickets. When these experts were called all of them testified that they were plain tickets and were without distinguishing marks.

Mr. MILLER. And who could better testify to that than a printer?

Mr. CALKINS. This testimony was not contradicted. I repeat again that if human testimony can establish anything it establishes beyond peradventure and successful controversy that Mr. Lynch used all the diligence that it was possible for any man to use to get tickets that would be within the law and not obnoxious to it. I say that much in defense of Mr. Lynch.

My friend from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER,] my friend from Ohio, [Mr. ATHERTON,] and other gentlemen have referred to the fact that in this contest there was no charge of intimidation or fraud. And my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER,] whom I do not now see in his seat, went further than that, and said that since 1876, since that State was redeemed from the thraldom of carpet-baggery and scalawagism, the State had had profound peace.

I am loth to and will not open up a controversy which should be forever sealed. But for the sake of truth I must say that the history of that time has been well preserved. I hold in my hand volume 18 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Forty-fourth Congress. At page 22 of the appendix of that volume, in a speech by Governor Morton in the proceedings of the Senate of that date, I find over one hundred newspaper extracts from every part of Mississippi during that campaign, as to the methods that were adopted for the purpose of redeeming that State as it is called from scalawagism and carpet-baggery.

They were words written at the time the acts were committed. They were the testimony furnished by Democratic editors and newspaper men. They have been preserved and will live as a part of the records of this country. They were collated in a speech delivered by Governor Morton in the Senate on that occasion.

I call the attention of all readers of history who desire to become informed of the most outrageous offenses against the ballot-box that perhaps ever took place in any peaceable country to the testimony published throughout Mississippi by the editors. Whatever may have been the result of it, I do not doubt but that history will condemn the means made use of to obtain it.

I affirm that no violence or fraud or mob law, no matter what was intended, was ever right. It was a still greater crime to consolidate intimidation, fraud, and violence and make it a part and parcel of the election system of any part of this country. If Mississippi has a good government now, if that State is now passing on serenely in peace and quiet, nobody rejoices more than I. But the means by which that condition has been brought about remains and will forever remain a crime against the age in which such means were resorted to and such acts were perpetrated. I call attention to the following extracts which I find in that speech.

From the Meridian Mercury:

Rally on the color line, boys, beyond the platform, every man to his color and colors, and make these negro pretenders to govern this great county come down, else put 'em down. What do the young men say to the old man's battle-cry in this political campaign: "Step across the platform, boys, and go for 'em."

From the Westville (Mississippi) News:

"VOTE THE NEGRO DOWN OR KNOCK HIM DOWN."

Does not the very thought boil the blood in every vein? Will you still contend that we must not have a white man's party? Away with such false doctrines; we must and will have a white man's party. We have tried policy long enough. We must organize on the color line, disregarding minor considerations. The white man's party is the only salvation for the State. Show the negro his place and make him keep it. If we cannot vote him down, we can knock him down, and the result will be the same. Either the white man or negro will rule this country; they cannot both do it, and it is for the white man to say who the ruler shall be. Let us have a white man's party to rule a white man's country, and do it like white men.

From the Columbus Index:

The necessities of the State of Mississippi recall this injunction and give emphasis to the parallel—put none but Democrats in office.

We have gained a great victory—Bull Run or Chickamauga. Let us follow it up to the securing of results.

The white people must be welded into one compact organization. All differences of opinion, all personal aspirations, must be settled within our own organization, and from its decision there must be no appeal. Otherwise each recurring election produces its disorders.

From the Newton Democrat:

Mr. Potter and ex-Governor Brown, of Hinds, think the negro can be reasoned into Democracy, and they have been thinking so ever since the war; but for our part we would as soon reason with a shoal of crocodiles or a drove of Kentucky mules. And so might they, for all the convictions they have produced in the counties of Hinds and Copiah.

From the Yazoo Democrat:

Let unanimity of sentiment pervade the minds of men. Let invincible determination be depicted on every countenance. Send forth from our deliberative assembly of the eighteenth the soul stirring announcement that Mississippians shall rule Mississippi though the heavens fall. Then will woe, irretrievable woe, betide the radical tatterdemalions. Hit them hip and thigh, everywhere and at all times. Carry the election peaceably if we can, forcibly if we must.

I pass next to say that my friend from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] referred to the Maine case as being a precedent to establish and maintain the proposition that the highest courts of a State have often been resorted to for the purpose of determining questions of construction arising in the other co-ordinate branches of the Government. One single sentence in regard to that time and to that case.

If I understand correctly the history of that time—I mean the Garcelon controversy—he sought by legal technicalities and quibbles to suppress the honest vote of the State. To the honor of the supreme court of that State be it said that it stood solidly, without reference to the political proclivities of any of its members, for the glory, honor, and good name of their State, and overthrew those legal quibbles and technicalities. If the gentleman from Georgia can get any sort of comfort from that case I willingly accord it to him.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. The comfort which "the gentleman from Georgia" takes is that that decision being right, the country followed it. I mentioned it as an example of a whole State being revolutionized by a supreme court decision made at the time, to confound the gentlemen who refused to pay any attention to the decision of a supreme court elsewhere at the time.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman said that the country maintained that decision. It did so because the decision was right, and the country would maintain the decision of the supreme court of the State of Mississippi if it was right; but the trouble is that it was wrong.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. But the reason you give for not maintaining it is what I was referring to. That is the point I was discussing. You gave as a reason that it was only one case.

Mr. CALKINS. In the Maine case it was provided by the constitution of that State that the question should be determined by the supreme court of the State. The supreme court had jurisdiction of the question, and it made a decision in a case in which it had jurisdiction. In this case the supreme court of the State of Mississippi itself says that it had no jurisdiction, and it is therefore not a decision of the supreme court of Mississippi.

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit me to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question?

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I hope he will.

Mr. CALKINS. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. ROBESON. I want to ask the gentleman from Georgia this question: If the Supreme Court of the United States has jurisdiction to review the decision of a State court by reason of the character of the parties or the subject-matter of controversy, is the Supreme Court, when it comes to review such a decision of a State court, under the constitutional provision bound by the decision of the court which it is then reviewing? That is my first question.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I suppose any school-boy can answer that. No.

Mr. ROBESON. Secondly, when the Supreme Court of the United States in such a case sets aside the decision of the State court, does not that make the law for the State, the decision of the supreme court of the State to the contrary notwithstanding? Does not the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in a case in which it has constitutional authority to review the action of a State court make the law of the State?

Now, if we have constitutional authority to review, and are in this case reviewing the decision of the supreme court of the State of Mississippi, are we bound by the decision of that court in the very case which we are reviewing? If we are bound by that decision, how are we a court of review? And if in making this review we set aside the action of the supreme court of the State, is not our decision the law for the State of Mississippi?

Mr. CALKINS. I cannot yield further.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I ask the gentleman from Indiana how much time will be allowed to me to answer that question?

Mr. CALKINS. The same time that the gentleman from New Jersey has occupied—about two minutes.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Well, I will make this remark: if there were in Georgia any school-boy ten years of age who did not know how to answer those questions I would be in favor of abolishing our school system. [Laughter and applause.] The gentleman knows that any decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upon a question of which it has jurisdiction is the highest law.

Mr. ROBESON. Why?

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Because the Constitution gives it jurisdiction to decide.

Mr. ROBESON. Because the Constitution makes the Supreme Court a court of review. Now go on.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. While I am going on, I hope the gentleman will keep quiet. [Laughter.] I am answering him. The next question is whether, if we are authorized to make a review, our decision will not be final. I answer yes; but that does not authorize the Supreme Court of the United State to violate the law any more than it authorizes us to violate the law. I admired the grandeur of the posture of the gentleman yesterday when he threw back the lapels of his coat and trampled rough-shod over prostrate States; but I despised his law. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBESON. Then, according to the gentleman, we are not the judges of the law.

Mr. CALKINS. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ATHERTON.]

Mr. ATHERTON. I desire to say that I think the gentleman is mistaken when he says the supreme court of Mississippi declared that it had not jurisdiction. As I understand, the court did not say that, but simply said it was not necessary or might not have been necessary to decide all those questions; that the decision could have been put upon one or another of the several propositions presented. But it is a mistake to say that the court said it had no jurisdiction.

Mr. CALKINS. My colleague on the committee [Mr. ATHERTON] was not present when I discussed that part of the case, and I do not care to go over it again.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to refer to one other remark made by my friend from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] on the day before yesterday, and appearing in the RECORD of this morning. I read but a sentence because time will not allow further reference. After quoting from page 10 of the report, he says:

This language is strangely involved. It declares that State election laws are made "Federal law" by the Constitution and "adopted by Congress." It sounds oddly to talk of Congress adopting a constitutional result.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my friend from Georgia was, in my judgment, quite disingenuous in his criticism. That is not the meaning of the report; but if I understand the meaning of language it is that when Congress fails to provide a manner in which elections shall be conducted for members of Congress, then, under the Constitution, the State laws become for that purpose the Federal law. I submit for the consideration of my friend what was said by a distinguished writer about the critic. He said, "A criticism stands as an interrogation point, while logic stands like a monument." I commend the quotation to my friend. If there was nothing but criticism to be indulged, he has failed even in that.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. The gentleman does not contend that I did not quote him correctly?

Mr. CALKINS. Oh, no; it was the deduction entirely that I was talking about.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I was only trying to show that the gentleman was inaccurate, and he is not always accurate in the use of the English language when speaking of the origin of things.

Mr. CALKINS. I wish I had been favored with the privilege of going to school to the gentleman; but I was not.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I made that remark for amusement, and perhaps criticism; but I had in my mind at that time this sentence, uttered here by the gentleman on the 5th of February, 1880, when accounting for the origin of what he called the "true Westerner:"

The Cavalier led to the altar the Puritan girl, and their children's veins were tinged with the blood of the earlier colonists from the rivulets flowing from close springs.

That was about as satisfactory an explanation of the origin of the Westerner as the language of the gentleman in the present case is of the origin of the law. According to him, Congress became by adoption the father of the child of the Constitution, the Constitution still living.

Mr. CALKINS. That is far-fetched. It does not even provoke a smile. I commend the language and the speech quoted from to the gentleman as worthy to be perused by him some time when he has flights of fancy and not flights of criticism.

Mr. Speaker, I call attention to another portion of the gentleman's remarks, in which he enters into a criticism of a part of the report on page 19. He says he does not understand the language used. Probably I had better read what the gentleman says:

That law when Congress has not acted is the State law, and the State law is the State statute as construed by the State supreme court. We know not what the majority means when it says this idea is "likewise inimical to the soundest principles of national unity." Certainly it is not at war with our constitutional national unity.

Now, my friend says it is impossible for him to understand what was meant in the report by the words that it is inimical to the soundest principles of national unity for this House to be bound by a decision of a State court on a question committed by the Constitution to this House alone.

He does not understand how that can be inimical to the soundest views of national unity. In the sphere in which the States act under the Constitution they are sovereign. In the sphere in which the Government acts it is sovereign. One of the questions which cannot be divided with any tribunal by this House is the one as to the election of its own members. We may adopt the construction of State laws as determined by State tribunals, but the methods and processes of elections must forever be sacredly kept as the exclusive right of this House.

For the preservation of the autonomy of the Government, for the preservation of the House itself, this power must forever reside where the Constitution has put it, beyond State law or State tribunals, except as they may be adopted, as I have before stated.

Mr. Speaker, I quote one remark from the speech of my friend from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER.] He was speaking about negroes not representing any Northern Congressional districts.

He used the following language:

> And when I asked my friend that question, and he said the reason was there was a majority of white people in all the districts and voting places North to elect white people instead of black, I said then, "You have got to accept one or the other horn of this dilemma: either the free-school system of education which you adopt in reference to the African in the North has utterly failed to raise the African to a grade which would enable him to rank with any man on this floor, or the system of slavery in the South existing until seventeen years ago is a better educator to statesmanship and positions of political eminence than even the free-school system of the North."
> If this is not so you can only account for your not sending African Representatives by saying that the white men of the North exclude the African because he is such, and give preference to the white man because he is a Caucasian.

That, although it is left out here, was applauded on the other side.

Now, I am ready at any time, Mr. Speaker, and I challenge comparison with any government in the world of any of its systems with that of the free-school system of the North, but I cannot stand here to-day to insult the intelligence of the North by saying that there can be any comparison between African slavery as an educator and the free-school system of our Northern States, nor do I understand my friend from Virginia to maintain that there is room for any comparison. No, sir; our free schools speak for themselves.

The intelligence of the masses of our people, the little schoolhouses which dot our plains and adorn our hills, the immense revenues we pour out year by year in educating our boys and girls all over the North is the pride of our people and the assured guaranty of the perpetuity of our institutions. In that lies the hope of this Republic. This country must have an intelligent sovereign. The people are the sovereign, and they must be educated.

Mr. Speaker, we need no longer talk of slavery; it has gone forever. Its shackles can never again be fastened upon the limbs of any part of the people of this Republic. The blacks cannot be reenslaved. Once having felt the flame of liberty, they will die but never relinquish it. [Applause on the Republican side.] You may keep them from the polls, you may suppress their voice at the elections, you may run over them and trample them down, but the freedom which they have experienced, and the citizenship which came to them after the war, can never be torn from them. Freemen they will be forever. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, it is not true that the education of the blacks in the North is a failure. In spite of the old dogmas and doctrines of the ancient Democracy, they are making gigantic strides in that direction. In the South, as I am informed, the young are exceedingly anxious for an education.

The answer to the proposition of my friend from Virginia that no colored man has been sent to Congress from the Northern States is that from the South, in no district where the colored voters do not exceed the white has one ever come here, and never will, especially while it is under the control of the Bourbons.

Mr. TUCKER. I understand my friend from Indiana to say it is because the white people prefer a white man to a negro that neither section sends them.

Mr. CALKINS. My answer to the gentleman is this: that while we in the North believe in giving to the black man every advantage under the law——

Mr. TUCKER. Except to come to Congress.

Mr. CALKINS. They have every advantage under the law, if they have not got to Congress yet; and if one was elected there he would not be counted out. If the gentleman will allow me I am inclined to believe it will not be long before he will be slashing around through the Old Dominion trying to induce his colored brethren to send him back to Congress. Things are awfully torn up in that State. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. How will they be doing in Indiana?

Mr. CALKINS. They will do as they do in Illinois, I presume; but no matter about that.

The last question I desire to discuss in connection with this case is the testimony given by the gentleman controlling the Vicksburgh Herald, a leading Democratic paper in Mississippi. Now, I do not say what the condition of things in Mississippi is from personal observation. Personally I know nothing about it. I must judge of that from what I see in the record.

Here is the sworn testimony, not of a Republican, but of a Democrat of a condition of affairs which I say must yield; and I ask, Mr. Speaker, to have the House listen to a small portion of the testimony of Charles E. Wright, as appears in this record, on page 31. He is editor of the Vicksburgh Herald, one of the leading papers of that State, and until recently everybody would have said the leading Democratic paper of that State. He says, speaking of the political course of that paper, on page 33:

> It has differed with some of the extreme papers in this State. I have sustained the Democratic administration of Mississippi, the Democratic judges, and every thing else. It is not true that when I returned from Washington, a year ago last spring, the tone of the paper became changed and differed with the Democratic administration of the State. It never has. I differed with the leaders of the party concerning the issue they made in Congress about that time, and said so editorially half a dozen times. It is not true I have since then denounced the leaders of the Democratic party as "machine politicians," or something of that kind. It is not true that I denounced the leaders of the Democratic party as "Bourbons." I regard Mr. LAMAR——

Now, mark you—

> I regard Mr. LAMAR as the leader of the Democratic party in Mississippi, and I know he does not approve those things I issued with. I never made an issue with the leaders of the party. I refer to fraud and violence as things Mr. LAMAR does not approve of. I have not taken any new departure. I have opposed them ever since I have been editor of a paper. I was the editor of a paper published in Vicksburgh in 1873 or 1874 called the Vicksburgher, and of the paper called the Monitor in the following year.
> Q. What fraud or violence have you known committed for running for office since March, 1879?
> A. The most prominent affair was in Yazoo, in 1879.
> Q. What fraud or violence did you know as being committed in Yazoo in 1879?
> A. I do not live in Yazoo County, and know nothing of my own personal knowledge. I only know just like I get other information for the Herald.

Newspaper men know how to get information generally for the papers.

> Q. Do you know of your own knowledge any fraud or violence committed against anybody running for office?
> A. I answer as before, I do not know of my own knowledge.

Now, turning to page 35, here is what he says, and here is what I denounce, and shall continue to cry out against until it ceases:

> Q. Please to define what you understand by Bourbonism and Conservatism? (Objected to by counsel for General Chalmers as irrelevant and not re-examination.)
> A. The difference, as I understand it, is this: the Bourbons in this State are an extreme faction of the Democratic party; they are willing to go outside of law and the Democratic platform, and anything else, and resort to violence and fraud for the sake of party success. I think the conservative Democrats are opposed to that, and want to let the elections go as the ballots are cast. That is my view of the difference. I regard Senator LAMAR as the leader of the Democratic party in this State and General Chalmers as identified with the extreme men.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the point I want to make is, that this is neither the testimony of negroes nor Republicans. It is the testimony on the record in this case, from one of the brightest Democrats in the State, if I understand it aright, and the point he makes is that he is opposed to that policy which has prevailed in the State which will disregard law, disregard order, disregard the counting of ballots as they are cast, and that is what he cries aloud against, and may God Almighty give him lungs that will be heard throughout the whole South. [Applause.]

The Republican party demands that the ballots shall be counted as they are cast; that when an elector casts one ballot that shall be honestly counted as it was cast. That is the broad platform on which the Republican party stands. And this is the point made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOORE] when he said that the better people of the South were in favor of an honest ballot, and counting them according to the law of the land. The liberties of the people depend upon this, for the love of liberty is the love of law, and without law there is anarchy.

In conclusion allow me to say, although it may not be safe to count all of the negroes of the South as voters of the Republican ticket, certainly not in election cases, yet, Mr. Speaker, that it is the universal testimony of almost all the men who have spoken upon the subject, and of those who are competent to speak upon it, and the facts bear out the assertion, that the great mass of the negroes of the South are Republicans. In the very nature of things they ought to be, they must be at least for this generation.

It was that party and the leaders of that party that gave them their freedom. It was that party, and it is the spirit that now animates those who act with it, that took from their limbs the shackles of slavery and made them freemen. It was that party that placed in their hands that badge of sovereignty, that raised them from servitude to the grand plane of citizenship. [Applause.] It was that party that placed, not a tiara upon the head, but the ballot in the hands of a freeman. It was that party that has protected them. It is that party that has stood by them and aided them in all of their troubles. It is that party that will stand by them to the end, whatever may come. [Applause.] Not because they are negroes, but because in the very necessity of things leading to their freedom and clothing them with full citizenship; by the very force of circumstances and the protection which that party has thrown around them by its legislation it has given pledge of its fealty to justice.

Having obtained from that party every boon that could have been granted them in their helpless condition they naturally look to that party still for guidance, and it would be cowardly in us to desert them. But the time is coming—I hope it is near at hand—when, not only throughout the North, in every part of the land this same sentiment will be recognized as the intelligent sentiment of an enlightened nation.

And I do now assure my friends that any liberal men in the South that reach out their hands to us who are imbued with this one grand sentiment will be heartily grasped from whencesoever they come. [Applause.] No matter what the past has been, it shall be no longer remembered. Give us a free vote, a fair count, an honest election. That is all we ask. If there has been bitterness between us we put it by as belonging to the past. But do not immolate truth and justice for party success. We stand for liberty and law. And I say to the negroes that the same spirit which secured them these blessings will educate their children, and the good people of all parties will stand by you in every forward step you take toward civilization and say God bless you. [Great applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the first resolution as reported by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That James R. Chalmers was not elected and is not entitled to his seat in the Forty-seventh Congress from the sixth district of Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MOULTON] moves, as a substitute for this resolution what the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That John R. Lynch was not elected and is not entitled to a seat in the Forty-seventh Congress from the sixth district of Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MOULTON.]

At the conclusion of the call the following took place:

Mr. MARSH. I am paired with the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. McKENZIE,] with the reservation, however, that I could vote to make a quorum. I have voted on this question; but as there is a quorum without my vote, I will withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The vote of the gentleman will be withdrawn.

Mr. McCOOK. I am paired with the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS,] reserving distinctly to myself the right to vote to make a quorum, and I have voted. Understanding that a quorum has voted without me, I withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER. The vote of the gentleman will be withdrawn.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am paired with the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] reserving the right to vote to make a quorum. I would like to inquire of the Chair if votes enough have been given to make a quorum?

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman voted on this question?

Mr. HISCOCK. I have.

The SPEAKER. A quorum has voted and more.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then I will withdraw my vote.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I am paired with my colleague [Mr. BEACH] on the same conditions. I have voted to make a quorum, but understanding that there is a quorum without my vote, I will withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The vote of the gentleman will be withdrawn.

Mr. GEORGE. I am paired with the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. WILSON,] with the privilege of voting in case it is necessary to make a quorum.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman voted?

Mr. GEORGE. I have; and if a sufficient number has voted to make a quorum I will withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER. The vote of the gentleman will be withdrawn.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. THOMAS with Mr. CURTIN.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. HOOKER. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made to dispensing with the reading of the names, they will be read.

The Clerk then read the names of those voting; after which the result was announced as above stated.

Mr. CALKINS. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the second resolution reported by the majority of the Committee of Elections. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That John R. Lynch was elected, and is entitled to his seat in the Forty-seventh Congress from the sixth district of Mississippi.

Mr. ATHERTON. Upon that resolution I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. CALKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. Lynch, whom the House has just declared entitled to a seat, is present. I ask that he be sworn in.

The SPEAKER. That is a question of privilege.

Mr. Lynch was conducted by Mr. CALKINS to the Clerk's desk amid applause from the Republican side, and was duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by section 1756 of the Revised Statutes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KLOTZ. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. BOWMAN. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not press that motion. Let us have a vote on the bill referring private claims to the Court of Claims. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. CASWELL. I desire to call up the report of the committee of conference on the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. RANDALL. That does not take precedence of the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. CASWELL. I rise to a point of order. Does not the conference report take precedence?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. KLOTZ, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 50, noes 101.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CASWELL. I now call up the report of the committee of conference on the Post-Office appropriation bill. It is printed on the last page of to-day's RECORD. I ask that the Clerk read the report and accompanying statement.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] desire the report read in full?

Mr. CASWELL. No, sir; I do not care particularly about it.

Mr. RANDALL. Let it be read.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am not objecting to dispensing with the reading; but I desire the gentleman who presents the report to make some statement in explanation of it.

Mr. ATKINS. There is a detailed statement accompanying the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] asks that the report be read. The reading can only be dispensed with by unanimous consent.

The Clerk read the report and accompanying statement, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3548) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 6, 11, 18, and 20.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 14, 16, and 19; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 15:

Amendment numbered 17:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 17, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Add at the end of the amended paragraph the following: "And the Postmaster-General is authorized to designate postmasters at Presidential post-offices as disbursing officers for the payment of the salaries of the officers and employés of the postal service concerned in the transportation of mails, or in their distribution in transit, and for such other payments as they are now authorized to make from postal revenues;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 21:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,902,177.90;" and the Senate agree to the same.

L. B. CASWELL,
J. G. CANNON,
E. JNO. ELLIS,
Managers on the part of the House.

P. B. PLUMB,
W. B. ALLISON,
J. B. BECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Statement in explanation of report.

The amendments upon which the two Houses disagree are as follows: Nos. 1, 2, 6, 11, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21.

The effect of the recommendation of the report, if adopted, will be as follows:

On amendment No. 1: To allow $3,000 of the sum appropriated for mail depredations and post office inspectors, &c., to be paid the chief post-office inspector.

On amendment No. 2: The provision requiring additional advertising of mail lettings is rejected.

On amendment No. 6: The sum for miscellaneous and incidental items is left at $90,000, as originally proposed by the House.

On amendment No. 11: In the proviso as to contractors or sub-contractors the insertion of the words "on any contract hereafter made" is rejected.

On amendments Nos. 14 and 15: The sum for necessary and special facilities on railroad lines is fixed at $600,000; to be expended on trunk lines leading to the principal cities in the United States as far as practicable.

On amendment No. 16: To fix the sum for railway post-office clerks at $1,700,000; an increase of $50,000 on the original bill.

On amendment No. 17: To fix the sum for route agents at $1,555,000, which is an increase of $180,000 on the original bill, and to authorize the Postmaster-General to designate postmasters at Presidental offices as disbursing officers for the payment of salaries of the officers and employés of the postal service concerned in the transportation of mails, or in their distribution in transit, and for all other legal payments to them.

On amendment No. 18: To fix the sum for mail messengers at $800,000, as originally proposed.

On amendment No. 19: Continues the right to use official stamps.

On amendment No. 20: To reject the Senate proposition in the nature of the franking privilege.

On amendment No. 21: To adjust the conditional deficiency money amount to correspond with the changes agreed upon under report.

Amount in money between the two Houses	$440,000
Senate yielded in conference	110,000
House yielded in conference	330,000
	440,000

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, although I signed this conference report, I was not in favor of some of the Senate amendments; but of course the very object of a conference is to reach an agreement, and ordinarily there can be no agreement unless there are concessions on both sides. I certainly would not have agreed to the amendments with reference to special mail facilities if I could have had my way. We have, however, substituted a clause which upon examination will be found an improvement upon the Senate amendment, while it is substantially in harmony with the original House draft. The Senate, which originally proposed to increase the appropriation to $650,000, recedes in this report as to $50,000, and agrees to an appropriation of $600,000. This is the best we could do. For that reason I have concurred with the other conferees in signing the report.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to ask the gentleman whether this conference report specifies in what manner the $600,000 appropriated for special mail facilities is to be expended?

Mr. CANNON. I will read the amendment if the gentleman desires.

Several MEMBERS. Read it.

Mr. CANNON. The provision which this conference report proposes for adoption by the House is this:

For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines, $600,000; said facilities to be extended as far as practicable to the principal cities of the United States.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the present law with regard to the manner of the expenditure of this money?

Mr. CANNON. I understand the present law is substantially the same as this provision, although the latter clause of the amendment is not in the present law. But after all said and done, the expenditure of this money is discretionary with the Postmaster-General.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman has said what I was about to remark, that there is no law at all regulating this expenditure except the discretion of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. CANNON. That is true; and I feel quite sure that the present Postmaster-General will expend this money wisely.

I think it is his intention, as nearly as the committee could ascertain it, to establish a great trunk line leading from the East to the far West, and one from the Northeast to the Southwest, say substantially from Boston and New York to New Orleans and Texas. The committee hope, and believe, after full inquiry, the expenditure of this money will be wisely made by the Postmaster-General. At the same time, as one member of the committee, and I believe the House conferees substantially agree with me, I wish to state that in the beginning this was an unwise appropriation, and to express the hope that Congress at an early day will so amend the law relating to the compensation of railways as to strike this item out entirely.

Mr. ATKINS. Is there anything to prevent the Postmaster-General giving the special facilities to parallel lines of railway?

Mr. CANNON. There is nothing.

Mr. ATKINS. Will he distribute it throughout the United States according to centers of population?

Mr. CANNON. There is nothing to prevent it. I will say to the gentleman that in many of our appropriations there is nothing in the text of the law to prevent the abuse of a discretion. The exercise of discretion depends greatly on the wisdom and integrity of the exective officer and on the supervisory power of the legislative department.

Mr. BLOUNT. While the gentleman is on the matter of discretion, let me say I hope we will find the service between here and New Orleans getting better as the appropriation increases instead of getting worse, as has been the case heretofore.

Mr. CASWELL. I yield now to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, according to the law as it now stands the appropriation of $500,000 for special mail facilities is applied at the discretion of the Postmaster-General to trunk lines between the city of New York and the city of Chicago. Am I right in that statement?

Mr. CASWELL. What is the gentleman's statement?

Mr. SPRINGER. That the appropriation of $500,000 for the current year is under the discretion of the Postmaster-General, and is applied to trunk lines leading out from New York to the South and West.

Mr. CASWELL. Not altogether toward the South and West.

Mr. SPRINGER. All the roads which receive the benefit of that appropriation center in the city of New York under the law as it now stands.

Mr. CASWELL. Let me say the object of the service seems to be that there should be one initial point of starting at New York and running westerly and southerly.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the appropriation now is $500,000, and New York is the central point from which the roads run upon which this appropriation is expended. The increased appropriation is $50,000.

Mr. CANNON. One hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars for the current year.

Mr. SPRINGER. One hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars, with the appropriation for the current year, would make $675,000.

Mr. CANNON. It is $425,000 now.

Mr. SPRINGER. And $175,000 is proposed to be added to start new centers from which trunk lines shall be subsidized for special mail facilities.

Mr. CASWELL. Let me say that the Postmaster-General came before our committee and explained to us his intention to have a starting point at New York and to have the line continued through to the Pacific coast, saving nearly two days in service between New York and San Francisco. It was further his intention to start from New York and run a trunk line through to New Orleans for the benefit of the Southwest. It is not his intention to make new starting points, but to have the service started from New York and continued as far as the money will permit.

Mr. BLOUNT. But why with the money already appropriated has not there been better service between New York and New Orleans?

Mr. CASWELL. It only extended to Atlanta, saving twelve hours between New York and that city.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to state before I yield the floor that I am opposed to this whole appropriation for special mail facilities. I regret our committee of conference have agreed to a portion of the Senate amendment increasing this appropriation. The object for which these special appropriations are made is to subsidize certain large railroads of the country into carrying the mails. There is no necessity for carrying the mails faster than the ordinary travel of the people. There is no demand for such fast mails in the country as to call for the expenditure of $600,000 a year in order to send mails faster than people desire to go. This has been used heretofore on a few of the great lines of railroad, and we are now about to enter upon a system of extending these fast-mail facilities so every city in the United States will have a train leaving at four or five in the morning in order to carry the daily papers to the rural districts before the country papers can be published.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is in opposition to the country papers.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is a measure to subsidize great railroads, and for the purpose of getting metropolitan newspapers before the people, and is not in the interest of increased communication among the people or in the interest of economy. I shall vote against agreeing to the conference report, and hope the House will disagree to it and insist there shall be no further appropriation of this kind.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Speaker, the condition of this increased appropriation, so far as the proposition embodied in this amendment of the Senate means anything, and I suppose it would not have been inserted unless it meant something, is that the whole of the money appropriated by this bill shall be used as far as practicable to open communications with all the great cities throughout the country. Now, then, if you establish fast-mail communication between New York and Chicago, for instance, for the accommodation of the people of those two great cities, you accommodate the people just as much by using one road connecting those cities as if you applied this fund to two different lines.

Therefore the money here appropriated is forbidden to be used on two or more parallel lines terminating at the same points, and cannot in this case be so used, for the reason that the object of the law is to supply the needs of the other cities as well, and to carry that mail on from Chicago to New Orleans, and from New Orleans, if necessary, to Galveston. If, therefore, the Postmaster-General agrees to subsidize—for this is a subsidy, we all admit that—if he agrees to subsidize a certain railroad company for the transportation of the mails of the United States from New York to Chicago, he has no right to use any more of that appropriation between those points than is necessary for that purpose. If that accommodates the mails and the people he can use no more than is absolutely necessary to carry out the law; and he cannot give a like amount to any other rival railroad company. He must take the remainder and apply it under this law to carry the mails to other parts of the United States. With that understanding, which is the only understanding that this clause of the appropriation is susceptible of, and all that it means if it means anything—I say with that understanding I will vote for the report of the conference committee and I hope the House will vote to sustain the report.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask the gentleman from New Jersey, before he takes his seat, if it is not true that there is no law which prevents using this fund in another way?

Mr. ROBESON. This law is a direction to the executive; and if he wastes double the money that is necessary to facilitate the mails between New York and Chicago, for instance, and by that means deprives other great cities of the benefit of the appropriation, he violates the spirit and intent of the law making the appropriation.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman must furnish the Department, then, with his speech, for the bill does not show anything of the kind.

Mr. ROBESON. Well, the RECORD will show it.

Mr. CASWELL. I yield now to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. While this conference report is under consideration by the House, I want to direct attention for a moment to a matter which did not properly come before the conference committee, but which ought to be mentioned in this connection. The original estimate, as prepared by the late Postmaster-General, Mr. James, for the star-route service, after a conference among the Post-Office officials, I am informed was increased in excess of $500,000, and was increased upon the basis of an apprehension that there might possibly arise a combination among the bidders for that service which would make it embarrassing to the Department in letting the contracts if they did not have plenty of leeway, as I may describe it, in the amount of money appropriated for the service.

Since that time these bids have been opened, and the service has been let in many cases, at all events to a sufficient degree to show that the late Postmaster-General was accurate in his estimates, and that the combination which was supposed might be made among these bidders was not really made. The number of contracts which have been let since the estimates were made bear out the original figures of the Postmaster-General. I have brought this matter to the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and I may be permitted to say that I have found him very ready to make in some way the necessary correction which should be made in this appropriation; because he thinks, as I think, that if we give this amount, $500,000, it will all be expended; that the demand for the increase of this star-route service will be such on routes which did not heretofore apply as to exceed the aggregate amount of the appropriation.

Mr. CASWELL. Before the gentleman from Pennsylvania proceeds farther, I desire to correct him, if he will permit me, in his statement. He refers to an appropriation of $500,000 for the star service. This increase was for the railroad service, and not for the star service at all. It does not apply to that at all.

Mr. RANDALL. I am speaking of the amount which was agreed upon in the Department.

Mr. CASWELL. But there is no increase in the star service.

Mr. RANDALL. There was an increase of the amount originally agreed upon in the Post-Office Department before estimate was transmitted to Congress.

Mr. CASWELL. We give the amount estimated for by the Department.

Mr. RANDALL. But the estimates were increased——

Mr. CASWELL. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him I will say he is in error; that we reported in the original bill the exact amount estimated by the Postmaster-General.

Mr. RANDALL. That I do not contradict. But I say that the amount as originally agreed upon by Postmaster-General James for transmission to Congress was increased after a conference with other Department officers under an apprehension that there might be a combination among the bidders so that the amount they had originally fixed would be insufficient. And I think I am accurate in my information.

Mr. CASWELL. I will say this. The amount allowed this year and the amount of the estimate is less than the amount appropriated for the current year.

Mr. RANDALL. It was to meet a contingency which did not subsequently arise. I only desire to call the attention of the committee to these facts so that they may on some other bill or in some other way by legislation reduce this half million. I think I am so well informed that I cannot be mistaken, and I would like to hear from the chairman of the committee whether I am not, with the information I have, justified in calling the attention of the House to this particular subject.

Mr. HISCOCK. Some time ago the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] called my attention to the facts which he has stated in his place on the floor. As I understood from him at that time, and I think to some extent I have verified the information which he gave me when the bids were opened, it was found upon the basis of those bids that too liberal an appropriation had been made for the star service. I have investigated the matter to some extent, and I think the gentleman is entirely right in calling the attention of the House to it. And if in the end it appears that there is as large an amount as he seems to think there is, and as there probably is, it may be right upon a future bill to reduce the amount of appropriation which has been made for that service.

Mr. RANDALL. That is all I ask.

Mr. CASWELL. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.]

Mr. CANNON. I only want a moment. I would not ask to be heard again but for the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] touching the item for special facilities. If that appropriation be made at all it is desirable that there be no further limitation placed upon it by debate or otherwise than is placed upon it in the language of the amendment; because in the very nature of things, if we give the Postmaster-General this money to make the best bargain he can to give a good service to reach the principal cities of the United States, we ought not by expression or direction other than is contained in the language of the amendment itself to circumscribe that discretion. It is absolutely necessary if he is to make a good contract or contracts that he be left free, so that he can make the best bargain he can. I only wanted to make that remark in reply to the remark of the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. ROBESON. The language is, "to be extended as far as practicable"—as far as practicable, of course.

Mr. CANNON. Of course they are to be extended as far as practicable; but if the Postmaster-General takes this money he will take it in the language of the amendment, without his discretion being further fettered.

Mr. ROBESON. But the construction of the amendment is to be found in the purpose of it, and that is to extend the special facilities to other cities; and the Postmaster-General would not be doing this "as far as practicable" if he stops with taking two routes from New York to Chicago and does not go any further, when by taking one route he can go twice as far.

Mr. CASWELL. I think the Postmaster-General understands the situation and will carry out the object of the amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask the gentleman how the amount for the star-route service in this bill compares with the amount expended last year?

Mr. CASWELL. I cannot give an exact comparison.

Mr. CANNON. It is greatly smaller than the amount expended last year. I have got the data somewhere in my desk.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not want the exact data. I suppose, then, this is not an unreasonable amount.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; it is not an unreasonable amount.

Mr. CASWELL. There is a growing decrease in the star service on account of the increase in the railway-mail service absorbing to some extent the star routes.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think the gentleman is mistaken as to that. To the extent railroads are built to the places served by the star routes there is a decrease; but the mileage and expenditures of the star routes otherwise are increasing all the while.

Mr. HUMPHREY. We are making more country all the while.

A MEMBER. Not making more country, but filling it with population.

Mr. ATKINS. I understand we only gave the estimate for the star service.

Mr. HISCOCK. We only gave the estimate. As has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] that estimate was too large. He understands it is too large, and the inquiries I have made would seem to verify his understanding upon that subject.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] a question. He says the estimate for the next year is too large. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] says it is not so great as the amount expended last year. Does my friend mean to say by its being too large that he proposes still further to reduce the star service?

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, no.

Mr. BLOUNT. On what principle is it too large?

Mr. HISCOCK rose.

Mr. TOWSHEND, of Illinois. I suggest that the conference report be printed and that we adjourn now.

Mr. CANNON. The report has already been printed. It is in the RECORD, page 3438.

Mr. CASWELL. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 68, noes 27.

Mr. SPRINGER and Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. REED. We should not do that.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The point being made that no quorum has voted tellers will be ordered.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CASWELL and Mr. SPRINGER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were ayes 107, noes 38.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on adopting the report of the committee of conference.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were 5 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative not being one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The report of the committee of conference was accordingly adopted.

Mr. CASWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. CAMP. Let us vote on the Court of Claims bill first. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to adjourn the Chair will submit some personal requests; and also some executive documents.

SALE OF UNSERVICEABLE STATIONERY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Clerk of the House showing the proceeds of the sale of shelf-worn and otherwise unserviceable articles of stationery; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER announced, as the conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3208) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense and for the armament thereof for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, Mr. FORNEY of Alabama, Mr. KETCHAM of New York, and Mr. RYAN of Kansas.

REORGANIZATION OF THE SECOND NATIONAL BANK OF CINCINNATI.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to the resolution of the House of the 27th instant, relative to the reorganization of the Second National Bank of Cincinnati, Ohio; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that that communication be also printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The communication is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
Washington, April 28, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the following resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 27th instant:

"Whereas the charter of the Second National Bank of Cincinnati will expire on or about the 25th day of May next; and

"Whereas it is alleged that said bank has gone into liquidation and has reorganized to continue its existence as a corporation under existing law: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That the Comptroller of the Currency is hereby directed to communicate to this House any correspondence between him and the officers of the said bank in relation to said liquidation and reorganization, and to inform this House under what existing statutes said reorganization was authorized; and further, to communicate the manner and form prescribed of such reorganization by national banks."

The Second National Bank of Cincinnati was organized on May 26, 1863, with a capital of $100,000, which was subsequently increased to $200,000. The corporate existence of the bank would continue under section 11, act of February 25, 1863, until the close of business on the 25th day of May 1882.

The President of the bank, Hon. Benjamin Eggleston, called at this office early during the present month, and informed me that it was the desire of the shareholders of that bank to organize a new institution at the time of the expiration of the corporate existence of the bank then in operation, so that the business of the old institution might be, as far as possible, continued by the new. He stated that there would be no opposition whatever to the organization of the new institution, and that all of the shareholders of the bank then in operation would be represented in the new association. Subsequently, on April 11, he addressed me the following letter:

"SECOND NATIONAL BANK OF CINCINNATI,
"Cincinnati, April 11, 1882.

"DEAR SIR: The charter of this bank will expire on the 25th of May, and the stockholders wish to form a new association to commence business as soon as the old one goes out of existence, taking the same name, with the same capital, and in the present place of business.

"Our stockholders include many of our leading citizens, namely: Benjamin Eggleston, Warren Rawson, Charles Davis, James B. Wilson, and Joseph W. Wayne, and many others.

"Will you please give us your consent and also send necessary 'blank forms.'

"Any suggestions you may offer will be gratefully received.

"Very respectfully,

"WILLIAM S. ROWE, Cashier."

"COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY, Washington, D. C."

To the above letter I replied as follows upon the 13 instant:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
Washington, April 13, 1882.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 11th instant, relative to the approaching expiration of the corporate existence of your bank, which takes place at close of business on May 25, 1882.

Under the recent decision of the Attorney-General there is nothing in the present law to prevent the stockholders of national banking associations the franchises of which expire, or which have gone into voluntary liquidation under sections 5220 and 5221 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, from organizing other national banking associations with the same name.

To avoid difficulties which might ensue were you to wait until the expiration of your franchise at close of business on May 25, 1882, the present association should be put into voluntary liquidation by the vote of stockholders owning two-thirds of the stock under the sections above mentioned. The vote may be taken with the understanding that it is to take effect upon some future day—at least thirty days prior to the expiration of the franchise.

A blank form is inclosed for the purpose of notifying this vote to this office, and the manner in which it should be filled up is indicated in pencil.

The form of notice to bill-holders and creditors is also printed on the lower portion of this blank, with directions for its publication. If the day selected for liquidation be April 25, the new association can be organized so as to commence business upon the 26th.

Your stockholders should proceed to organize the new bank in precisely the same way as if there had been no Second National Bank of Cincinnati in existence, paying in 50 per cent. of its capital, &c., as required by the national banking law. The minimum capital required for a national bank located in Cincinnati is $200,000. It will be necessary for the stockholders to pay up $100,000 of this sum before the new bank can be authorized to commence business.

Any of the stockholders, not less than five natural persons, can enter into articles of association for a bank with a capital of $200,000. If any are executors or trustees evidence of their authority to subscribe for the stock of new bank must accompany the papers. They can then execute an organization certificate and open a new set of books.

The necessary blanks for the organization of a new bank are inclosed herewith. They should be executed in duplicate and one original in each case sent to this office. The articles of association and organization certificate can be executed immediately upon the receipt of this letter, and with the oaths of directors, &c., can be filed at once. The certificate of officers to the payment of capital should be filed within about ten days of the liquidation of the old bank, and at the same time at least $50,000 in bonds should be deposited to the credit of the new bank. After the new bank commences business its capital can be increased from time to time by the directors under section 5142 of the Revised Statutes until all the capital of the old bank is transferred to it. Blanks for certifying such increase to this office are inclosed.

In the new articles of association the maximum of increase should be placed at such amount as may be deemed necessary, as it cannot, after it has been once fixed, be afterward changed.

When the old bank is in liquidation its depositors can be requested to withdraw their accounts from it by check and reopen them with the new bank. Those not wishing to do so must be paid. The assets can then, with consent of the stockholders, be transferred by the board of directors of the old bank to that of the new. The inclosed blank order for circulation can be filled out and sent with the certificate of officers and directors and bonds for deposit. New designs have been determined upon for notes of newly organized banks, and this order will cover the new plates, which will cost perhaps not more than $75 each. The bill for plates will be sent hereafter.

Within a reasonable time after the liquidation of the old bank, its circulation can be provided for by a deposit of lawful money through this office with the United States Treasurer. The deposit may be made with the assistant treasurer of the United States in New York, and his certificate of deposit sent to this office.

Prior to liquidation you can by depositing lawful money in the same manner release sufficient of the bonds of the old bank now on deposit, so that they may be transferred to the account of the new bank. The amount required for this purpose will be at least $50,000, and the lawful money deposit will be $45,000. Blank forms are inclosed for authorizing the withdrawal and transfer of the bonds, which may be executed and sent with the assistant treasurer's certificate and the Treasurer's duplicate receipts for the bonds to be withdrawn. The necessary withdrawal and transfer of $50,000 in bonds may be sent, with the certificate of officers and directors to the payment of 50 per cent. of the capital stock of the new bank, about ten days previous to the date of liquidation.

The new circulation will not be ready until about thirty days after the new bank is authorized to commence business. All the circulation called for by your order will then be ready, and you can then begin to deposit lawful money to retire the remainder of circulation of old bank, and transfer remainder of bonds to the new bank. As fast as these bonds are transferred new circulation will be sent to you.

The difficulties referred to in the third paragraph of this letter are outlined in the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Colby vs. National Bank of Selma, (21 Wallace, 609, or Thompson's National Bank Cases, 109-112,) which takes the ground that a national banking association, after the expiration of its franchise, has no existence for purpose of liquidation.

In this decision Justice Field says:

"With the forfeiture of its rights, privileges, and franchises, the corporation was necessarily dissolved as the decree adjudged.

"Its existence as a legal entity was therefore ended, and it was then a defunct institution, and judgment could no more be rendered against it in a suit previously commenced than judgment could be rendered against a dead man dying pendente lite. This is the rule with respect to all corporations whose chartered existence has come to an end, either by lapse of time or decree of forfeiture, unless by statute pending suits be allowed to proceed to judgment notwithstanding such dissolution.

"The prolongation of the corporate life for this specific purpose as much requires special legislative enactment as does the original creation of the corporation.

"No such enactment is found in the act of Congress authorizing the creation of national banks and prescribing their powers; nor is there any provision elsewhere that we are aware of which would prevent the dissolution of a corporation from working the abatement of a suit pending against it at the time."

Very respectfully,

JNO. JAY KNOX, Comptroller.

W. S. ROWE, Esq.,
Cashier Second National Bank, Cincinnati, Ohio.

The Second National Bank of Cincinnati (No. 32) went into liquidation on the 25th day of April, 1882, under sections 5220, 5221, and 5222 of the Revised Statutes; it deposited $45,000 of lawful money with the Treasurer of the United States and withdrew $50,000 of United States bonds. It filed in this office articles of association and an organization certificate as required by section 5136 of the Revised Statutes; also a certificate of officers and directors, showing that the amount of capital stock as provided in section 5140 of the Revised Statutes had been paid in. The oaths of directors were filed in this office as required by section 5147 of the Revised Statutes. These papers were similar in form to the papers filed by the original bank on May 26, 1863, and such papers as are now required to be placed on file in this office by all associations organizing as national banks. Fifty thousand dollars of United States bonds were also deposited for the purpose of perfecting the organization, and the certificate authorizing the bank to transact business was transmitted to the president in my letter of the 25th instant, which was as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
Washington, April 25, 1882.

SIR: Inclosed find certificate authorizing "the Second National Bank of Cincinnati" to commence the business of banking, which please publish on the receipt thereof for sixty days in a newspaper, in accordance with the requirements of section 5170, Revised Statutes, and forward to this office one copy of the newspaper in which the same is inserted.

Please have the organization number of your bank (2664) printed in plain large figures on your letter-heads used for correspondence with this office.

Very respectfully,

JNO. J. KNOX, Comptroller.

BENJAMIN EGGLESTON, Esq.,
President Second National Bank, Cincinnati, Ohio.

The number of national banks whose corporate existence has expired or will expire during the present month is eleven, in the following month of June sixteen and in the month of July twenty-four.

As it has been considered probable that some legislation would be passed by Congress extending the corporate existence of national banks, no printed circulars have been issued to the banks in reference to this subject, but written instructions in accordance with the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States of the 23d of February, 1882, have been given from time to time to various banks in reply to their communications, inclosing the usual blanks for liquidation and for the organization of new institutions.

It will be seen that the organization of the new bank in the city of Cincinnati was easily arranged for the reason that the interest of all of the shareholders of the old bank was considered in the organization of the new. Complications will, however, be likely to arise in the organization of new associations designed to succeed those whose corporate existence is to expire, unless some act is passed by the present Congress authorizing the continuance of those national banks whose corporate existence will cease previous to February 25, 1883.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JNO. JAY KNOX, Comptroller.

Hon. J. WARREN KEIFER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SENATE.

MONDAY, May 1, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents a petition of citizens of Chicago, Illinois, praying for the passage of a law providing that appointments to subordinate offices shall be made by competition, and removals from office shall be made for legitimate cause only. The Chair has not counted the number of signers of the petition, but there are many hundreds. He would inquire of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] if there has not been a report from the committee having the subject to which this petition refers under consideration?

Mr. PENDLETON. A bill has been reported back, and leave was given to the committee to make a written report at any time. That report is now in process of preparation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the petition lie on the table, or shall it be referred to the committee?

Mr. PENDLETON. It had better be referred to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented two petitions of citizens of the lead-mines district, Wythe County, Virginia, praying an appropriation on the basis of illiteracy to aid in education in the various States; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, presented a petition of citizens of Morgan County, West Virginia, praying national aid to free schools; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I present a petition of citizens of Greenbrier County, West Virginia, numerously signed, praying for a reduction in the internal revenue. The petition states that there are now 4,000 office-holders under the internal-revenue acts, which cost the Government over $5,000,000 per annum, and they ask that these taxes may be reduced as rapidly as the condition of the revenues will allow. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PUGH. I present a petition of several hundred citizens of Fayette County, Alabama, asking Congress for aid to education. As the Committee on Education and Labor has reported a bill for that purpose, I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAPHAM presented the petition of J. A. Thomas, by request of members of the Grand Army of the Republic of Moravia, New York, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1410) to amend the pension laws and the bill (S. No. 1695) to amend the pension laws by increasing the pensions of soldiers and sailors who have lost an arm or a leg in the service, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ALLISON presented a petition of citizens of Corydon, Iowa, and a petition of Rev. N. W. Thornton and others, of West Liberty, Iowa, praying for an appropriation for the promotion of education in Alaska; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented the petition of General C. S. Bentley and others, citizens of Iowa, praying for a change in the law relating to the distribution of arms in the several States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GARLAND presented a petition of citizens of Drew County, Arkansas, praying for an appropriation in aid of education in the various States on the basis of illiteracy; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. ROLLINS presented the petition of Daniel Donovan, of Washington, District of Columbia, praying compensation as an expert assistant to the attorneys of the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PENDLETON presented the petition of J. C. Whitehead and 12 others, citizens of Dansville, New York, praying for the passage of what is ordinarily known as the civil-service-reform bill; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

TRIALS IN CONSULAR COURTS ABROAD.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a paper which purports to be "a record of the proceedings in Ex Parte James O'Neil, an application for a writ of habeas corpus and permission to prosecute an appeal before Hon. John A. Bingham, United States minister in Japan." This record, if it be true, discloses the fact that an American citizen was tried by a consul for murder, was convicted of manslaughter, and sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment, a portion of which he had already suffered in a jail in one of the towns of Japan—I have forgotten the name—when an application was made for a writ of habeas corpus before the minister, which he declined to grant upon the ground that he had no jurisdiction to supervise the proceedings before the consul. Application was then made to him for permission to prosecute an appeal. He denied the permission upon grounds very fully stated in the paper which I present. The prisoner was then, under the direction of the Department of State, landed in California, where he now is.

I desire to say that I think the laws conferring criminal jurisdiction upon the consuls, vice-consuls, consuls-general, and ministers of the United States in the eastern countries are simply a disgrace to the administration of criminal law upon citizens of the United States.

I move that the paper be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which has already been referred a message of the President of the United States calling attention to this subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On the question of the reference of the paper, a copy of which I have seen and inspected, I wish to say that I am not altogether able to agree with my friend from Ohio as to the disgracefulness of the laws conferring criminal jurisdiction upon consuls and consuls-general. The United States I think has no criminal jurisdiction, in propriâ rigore, out of its own territory. If any of its citizens commit offenses in any foreign country, they are strictly liable to the law of the foreign country, to be administered by the tribunal of the foreign country, for trial and punishment for that offense.

In the eastern countries, the tribunals, the methods of investigation, and the punishments are in many instances far from being what we consider civilized. Accordingly it has been thought a good thing for the citizens of the United States who may be in the eastern countries to provide by treaty (for that is the only power under which we can touch them at all in those countries) for having crimes which are imputed to them tried in some way under the authority of the United States. This was agreed upon as a benefit to citizens of the United States who were in these out-of-the-way and ill-regulated places. If they are accused of anything, there is only one of two alternatives. They must either submit to whatever of jurisprudence, be it burning at the stake, or being tomahawked, or harakiried, or whatever, that what are called the laws of these countries provide, or else with the consent of the country where they are by treaty something is to be done with them; because it would not do to agree that a citizen of the United States should go absolutely free of all law in any foreign country where he happened to be. Therefore, as a choice of evils, so to speak, it was necessary to provide, and we have provided with Japan, China, Siam, and a variety of these places, that when an American citizen commits a certain class of offenses or is accused of committing them, instead of being subjected to the legitimate authority of the ruler of that country he is subjected to the authority of the United States exercised through its officers and agents, who happen to be there, in a certain way.

I agree that a consular trial is not the best possible means of securing human liberty always; it is not the best possible means of securing people who have been wronged against injustice; it is not the best possible means of punishing crime; but there are only two ways to do it, either under our authority there or under the authority of the country where they happen to be.

The only means at hand in such a country have been the means so far, it has been thought, which have been resorted to; because if you have set up a series of tribunals, judges, jurors, &c., while you could appoint the judges and have them go out and pay them and wait for the instances, which are rare, when you come to our Anglo-Saxon notions of a trial by jury for crime, in nine cases in ten you could not find the twelve men who would be fit to be jurors at all; and there is the trouble. The subject is involved in difficulty. I think we are apt to forget, when we criticise the state of the law now, that it was passed merely as an amelioration to the American citizen against subjecting him to the still more arbitrary and ill-regulated methods of the country where he happens to be.

I shall be very glad to join with my friend, as he knows, in trying to get some better state of things still; but I am not able to concur with any view (which my friend has not expressed, to be sure, but I have heard it expressed; it was expressed by the late Senator Carpenter) that the trial of a citizen of the United States accused of a criminal offense, in a foreign country, before a consul instead of before the tribunals of that country, was a violation of the Constitution of the United States. I confess I am not able to see it. The Constitution of the United States in regard to crimes cannot be in force in foreign countries. If so, the accused must be indicted by a grand jury; he must be indicted in the State or district, which shall have been previously ascertained by law, and so on; I need not enumerate to gentlemen who hear me now. It appears to me that the question is not one of constitutional consideration but simply of finding out (which I am very glad this will present an opportunity for trying to do) if there is any better way of protecting citizens of the United States consistently with the peace and good order of foreign countries where they allow us to try our own citizens than the ones we have. If we can do it consistently, I shall be glad to assist.

Mr. PENDLETON. I concur with the Senator in the idea which he has advanced, that it is better to try our citizens imperfectly under the consular courts than to subject them to the justice which might be administered in the native tribunals according to the laws of the countries in which they reside; but I know of no reason why it is necessary to prevent an appeal from a consular judgment to the jurisdiction of the United States in the district or circuit court of California. I know of no reason why a man should be executed in any of those foreign countries, as has been done, when he was applying to the minister for permission to appeal to the President of the United States for a pardon, which was refused, and the man was executed before he could make that appeal. We have here upon the records of the Senate in a message sent to Congress during this session a statement of outrages committed upon citizens of the United States in those countries, which would shock the Senate if they were thoroughly informed as to the facts.

I desire to perfect this system of consular courts. I desire to perfect the jurisdiction and administration of criminal justice in those countries. I desire to throw around the citizen every safeguard that is possible. I did not desire to introduce into the Senate to-day a discussion as to the question of the constitutional authority to set up any extra-territorial courts. I desired merely, as this seemed to me to be a striking case, to call the attention of the Senate and of the Committee on Foreign Relations, which has jurisdiction of this question under the order of the Senate, to the wrongs which are being committed in those countries upon our citizens, and to invoke the Senator from Vermont, who is a member of that committee, to give his aid, as I knew he would be willing to do, (for this is not a subject not heretofore discussed between us,) to perfect the system of the administration of the law by consular courts. It is because of cases like that to which I have alluded, cases where I think the system as administered does great harm and might be improved, that I have called attention to it in this way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sure my friend from Ohio and I do not seriously disagree about this matter, but I thought it right to say what I did in view of some observations that had fallen from him.

I wish to add now simply that as it regards the action of Mr. Bingham in this particular case, if I correctly read the paper, Mr. Bingham declined to allow an appeal in his judicial capacity for precisely the same reason that courts often decline to allow an appeal, that under his construction (and I am not sure but it was the right one; I rather think it was) of his duty under the treaty and the regulations of law, he had no more right to grant an appeal than any other citizen of the United States had; that is, the law and the treaties did not give him any jurisdiction to grant an appeal; the case was not in a condition where he could grant an appeal.

Then, when you come to the question of applying to the President of the United States to pardon an offense committed in Japan, in order to enable the President to have any efficacious right about it, it must be an offense against the laws of the United States. Whether the particular homicide alleged in this instance was charged to be an offense against the laws of the United States committed in Japan, might be a puzzle to a good many people. The intrinsic difficulty is the one which lies at the bottom: that, in the nature of government, whatever offense, whatever act, is committed within the jurisdiction, on the soil of one government, is an offense against the laws of that government, if it is an offense at all, and usually is not an offense against the laws of any other government. These offenses being committed or alleged to have been committed, the treaty provides that the tribunal shall be changed, that the sovereign of China, for example, abdicates his acknowledged jurisdiction over such a case, and allows the United States to exercise that jurisdiction as it regards its own citizens, in certain instances.

Therefore I think it is not at all clear that Mr. Bingham has erred, or has failed to do anything that he possibly and rightly could.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, only one word. I was particular in the remarks I made in presenting the paper to say nothing as to the character and conduct of the gentlemen who are administering the law. I know Mr. Bingham, and I would be very unwilling to say an unkind word about him. I believe that he has endeavored to do his duty as he understood it. I spoke of the system by which the criminal law is administered in those countries, and I said that that system, and not the men who administer it, was a disgrace to it and to the people.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I feel compelled to say, for one, to the Senate that I think if any minister of the United States has allowed a man to be put to death as a citizen of the United States in a foreign country when appealing to the President for a pardon, it is an act highly criminal in such officer and without any warrant of reason or any warrant of authority.

The proposition advanced by the Senator from Vermont is entirely untenable and without reason, in my judgment. If any foreign government has conceded to this country the right to set up a tribunal there for the administration of justice and the enforcement of law, that is no reason why this Government should not enact such statutes as will require that enforcement of law to be in accordance with the spirit of our Constitution and our modes of administering justice. On the contrary, it is a reason why we should pursue the principles of our Constitution and our forms of procedure.

For one, as a Senator, I undertake to say that if any minister of this country has turned a deaf ear to the appeal of a citizen in confinement under any authority conceded to us to administer the laws, he has been guilty of a grave offense against our form of government and the purposes for which it was designed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. JOHN BAILEY, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 5908) making an immediate appropriation for the removal of obstructions at Hell Gate, New York; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5352) to amend the laws with reference to elections in West Virginia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GROOME, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 464) granting an increase of pension, by way of arrears, to Maria A. Rousseau, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1573) to incorporate the Cherokee Central Railroad and Telegraph Company, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROLLINS submitted a written report, to accompany the bill (S. No. 625) to amend section 1556 of the Revised Statutes, giving longevity pay to certain officers of the Navy, heretofore reported; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1000) to prevent and punish the counterfeiting within the United States of notes, bonds, or other securities of foreign governments, reported it with amendments.

AFFAIRS IN ARIZONA.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the message of the President of the United States of the 28th of April—it is in the RECORD, page 3355, but by some inextricable accident has not yet been printed in document form—touching the condition of things in Arizona, and suggesting to Congress certain legislation by amending the provisions of law as they now stand in the act of 1878 regarding the use of the Army as a posse comitatus, to report that the committee has carefully considered the message; and I make the report orally, because, as it is a matter of urgent concern, we have had no time to draw up a written report. The committee instruct me to say that, in our opinion, there is no necessity in the case named for further legislation, and that the President of the United States has now ample power to put down the lawlessness in the Territory of Arizona referred to by him, and to restrain the marauding expeditions to which he refers, organized in that Territory to enter into the territory of the Republic of Mexico.

The reason for our opinion is this: as to expeditions into Mexico section 5286 of the Revised Statutes provides:

> Every person who, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, begins or sets on foot, or provides or prepares the means for, any military expedition or enterprise, to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, &c.

It might be thought, perhaps, at first view, that these marauding expeditions, armed bands going over merely for robbery and arson and so on, not designed to overturn the government of that country, might not be a military expedition against that people; but the committee have reason to believe that the true construction of that statute has been such, sometimes in the courts, and certainly, as I think, speaking for myself, without them, that any unlawful, organized armed force set on foot within the territory of the United States to invade the country of a friendly state for any purpose whatever, either to burn down a school-house or to rob a store or to steal cattle, is a military expedition and is set on foot against the people of that neighboring country, and that the President of the United States is armed with power, that nobody would criticise in either end of the Capitol or in any court, to repress that.

Then we come to the question of lawlessness in the Territory of Arizona of a domestic character. The message sets forth that:

> This disorder is caused by armed bands of desperadoes known as cowboys, &c. That the civil officers have not sufficient force to make arrests and hold the prisoners for trial, or punish them when convicted.

There is a case then, of course, of unlawful armed opposition to the authority of the United States. It is not a question, as the committee needs scarcely state, of insurrection or disturbance in a State against the laws of that State. There are no laws in Arizona but the laws of the United States. The Constitution does not provide for calling on the President by the executive of the Territory in case of such disturbance, but only in a State; but the Constitution does provide that the President of the United States, just as the State constitutions provide that the governor of a State shall do, shall take care that the laws of the United States are faithfully executed, and he is Commander-in-Chief of the Army, &c. Then come the various statutes on the subject beginning at the beginning of the century, but all crystallized now in section 5298 of the Revised Statutes on this subject, outside of a statute to which I shall presently allude:

> SEC. 5298. Whenever, by reason of unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons, or rebellion against the authority of the Government of the United States, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the President, to enforce, by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, the laws of the United States within any State or Territory, it shall be lawful for the President to call forth the militia of any or all the States, and to employ such parts of the land and naval forces of the United States as he may deem necessary to enforce the faithful execution of the laws of the United States, or to suppress such rebellion, in whatever State or Territory thereof the laws of the United States may be forcibly opposed, or the execution thereof forcibly obstructed.

A subsequent section provides that in that case he shall issue a proclamation commanding these evil-disposed assemblages and people to keep the peace and go home and mind their own business, the ordinary riot act as we should call it in our State operations. Then comes the act to which the President refers about the posse comitatus, contained in the Army appropriation bill of June 18, 1878, section 15, which is this:

> From and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful to employ any part of the Army of the United States, as a posse comitatus, or otherwise, for the purpose of executing the laws, except in such cases and under such circumstances as such employment of said force may be expressly authorized by the Constitution or by act of Congress.

When that act was passed, the Constitution and the act of Congress I have previously read, standing just as they do now, made the provision that I have read, which in clear and explicit terms, as the committee think, authorize the President to use the Army and the Navy, all the military force of the United States, and the militia as well, to enforce the laws of the United States in the Territory of Arizona if the state of disturbance there, in his judgment, is such that the ordinary processes of judicial procedure are inadequate to accomplish the end. Of course if they are adequate we do not want any legislation either to authorize the governor to raise volunteers or to spend money, or for any other purpose. If they are not, the law in explicit terms authorizes this to be done, and the act of 1878 does not prohibit but expressly recognizes the fact that where an act of Congress has authorized this in express terms, it still may be done.

The posse comitatus clause referred to arose out of an implied authority to the marshals and their subordinates executing the laws to call upon the Army just as they would upon bystanders who, if the Army responded, would have command of the Army or so much of it as they had, just as they would of the bystanders, and would direct them what to do. In all these cases the President of the United States having the power of employing any part of the Army from three soldiers to three thousand to assist in the execution of the laws in the Territory of Arizona, retains the dominion over this Army himself and the soldiers under command of their own officers to aid the civil authorities, instead of being under the command of the marshal of the Territory.

It appears to us, therefore, clearly—and we all agree upon the subject—that there is no need, for the purpose named in the message of the President of the United States, to change the law upon the subject. The technical posse comitatus which is not expressly authorized by law can be dispensed with, the President, as is perhaps best in these far-off places, retaining the command of the troops by his own officers, who are perhaps quite as safe a depository of such power as the marshal himself. He directs them to resist all this unlawfulness, merely first giving notice to these people that there is not going to be any more of it allowed.

So we think that the President is armed with ample power for this emergency already, and that it is not necessary that legislation should be had.

I repeat that we make this report orally for the reason that we had not time to draw it up in writing.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, as this is a very important matter, a matter which touches upon statutes of Congress, I wish to make a very few suggestions in addition to the report made by the Senator from Vermont, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, inasmuch as there is no written report presented.

In October, 1878, the then Attorney-General, in an opinion to President Hayes, had occasion to construe the different statutes referred to by the Senator from Vermont, and he reached a conclusion which I think is correct, and which supports the report made by the Senator from Vermont. It is to be found in the sixteenth volume of Opinions of Attorneys-General, page 162 and following. After referring to the fact that in using the military force of the United States as a posse under the act of the 24th of September, 1789, and then the sections of the Revised Statutes 5298 and 5300, the Attorney-General says:

> In this state of legislation I am of opinion that the marshal cannot be aided by the military forces of the United States as a posse in the execution of his process, upon the state of facts as it now appears. This state of facts will, however, enable the forces to be used for the enforcement of the laws, if the President shall deem proper to take certain additional steps, and if resistance to the laws shall thereafter continue.

Then he quotes the provisions of sections 5298 and 5300 and continues:

> If, therefore, the facts now present a case which, in the judgment of the President, justify him in so doing, he may issue his proclamation commanding the insurgents to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes within a limited time, and if they shall fail to do so, it will then be lawful for him to employ such parts of the land forces of the United States as he may deem necessary to enforce the laws of the United States.

Under these different sections of the statutes, if the President is satisfied that there is trouble there which cannot be put down by the ordinary civil processes, he may, under section 5300, issue his proclamation for those resisting the laws to disperse. If they fail to do that he may then call on the military force.

That is the unanimous opinion of the committee, and it gives him all the power that is necessary now in the troubles in Arizona.

PAPERS OF BENJAMIN FRANKLIN.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting a report of Theodore F. Dwight on the papers of Benjamin Franklin, offered for sale by Mr. Henry Stevens, and recommending their purchase by Congress, to submit a report in writing and to recommend an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill. I desire to have the report and amendment printed, and the amendment referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. INGALLS. What amount do the committee recommend to be appropriated?

Mr. HOAR. Thirty-five thousand dollars. These papers, among other things, contain the archives of the American legation in Paris and the first drafts of the Franklin letters to Congress, to Washington, Vergennes, and a large variety of public persons during the most important and interesting period of our Revolutionary history, and among them also is the original petition to the king, signed by the Delegates in Congress from all the States, and containing the well-preserved signatures of a great number of those persons whose faded autographs were annexed to the Declaration of Independence. Four public-spirited citizens of Boston a little while ago pledged the sum of money demanded for these papers to purchase them for the City Library of Boston. They, as I am told, are still willing to make the purchase. But they think that the archives of the State Department have the first claim to these important documents. That is the opinion of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be printed, and the proposed amendment will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1805) for the relief of the estate of Henry C. Boyd; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the nature of the bill?

Mr. JOHNSTON. It refers a claim to the Court of Claims.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it a judicial claim or an ordinary claim?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I understand that it is a judicial claim.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MCMILLAN (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1806) for the relief of Priscilla W. Burwell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LAPHAM (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1807) granting an increase of pension to Joel C. Lathrop; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAWLEY asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1808) granting a pension to Harriet E. Edwards; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONAS asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1809) to fix the rank and pay of assistant surgeons in the Navy not in the line of promotion; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ALLISON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1810) to authorize the Rock Island and Southwestern Railway Company to construct a bridge over the Mississippi River at New Boston, State of Illinois; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1811) to provide for the construction of the Illinois and Mississippi Canal, and to cheapen transportation; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. MAXEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 5559) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRISON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 5812) to establish post-routes; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

EDWARD CORNING.

Mr. MCMILLAN. On the 18th of April the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HARRISON,] from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported adversely the bill (S. No. 1326) for the relief of Edward Corning, which was put upon the Calendar at my request. I ask the Senate to recommit this bill to the committee, which is proposed with the consent of the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the order will be made.

APACHE INDIAN OUTRAGE.

Mr. CALL. Before the regular order comes up I desire to ask the consideration of the resolution I introduced on the 27th of April.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. CALL April 27:

> Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the murders and outrages lately committed on citizens of the United States in Arizona by the Apache Indians demand that the entire military power of the United States shall be used, if necessary, for the punishment of the perpetrators of these outrages and for the protection and security of our people in future.

Mr. CALL. I have no intention of making a speech in regard to this resolution. I ask for its present consideration, and that it shall be submitted to a vote of the Senate.

It seems to me that nothing is more obvious than that the power and dignity of this Government, indeed of any government that has a right to be a government, require it to protect its citizens from such outrages as have been committed lately in Arizona. There can be no question of the power of the Government to do it, nor of its duty to repress outrages which are revolting in every respect and which are constantly recurring.

The telegraph has brought to us the intelligence of a foray of armed Indians upon the people of Arizona, and the massacre of nearly one hundred persons, men, women, and children, within the last two weeks. I can see no reason whatever why that should be allowed to occur. For one, I wish to say that if it takes every man in the Republic and every dollar of money belonging to the Treasury, I think it ought to be expended, and there ought to be prompt action on the part of the two Houses of Congress for the suppression of these Indian outrages and their prevention in future.

As I said, there is no question of the power of the Government to protect the people of Arizona, no question of the power of the Government to exterminate every Indian who appears in arms and commits an outrage on the people there, and there is no question of the duty of the Government. I therefore ask that this resolution may be adopted.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the resolution be read. I did not hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Florida if he has any information which leads him to suppose that the entire power of the Government is not already being exerted for the purpose indicated in his resolution. I quite agree with him that every means at the command of the Government, whether it be military or otherwise, should be employed not only for the purpose of putting an end to the horrible scenes of which we are having accounts every morning by telegraph, but also of preventing their recurrence. Just what those means are I am not prepared to state; but one thing I am quite certain of, that it becomes the Government to see whether it is worth while to go on the way it has for the last twenty-five years, having an annual return of these scenes. Like the opening of the spring comes the account every year of these terrible massacres. I hope the Government will employ its military power, but I hope it will not stop there.

It seems to me to be a scandal upon the administration of public affairs that year after year shall come this annual return of these outrages upon peaceful citizens by a handful of men; that we can devise no method by which to deal with them that shall put an end to it some time or other.

I commend to the Senator not only a desire to put an end to this immediate outrage, but the consideration of some method for the prevention of its repetition. Putting it down by exterminating a handful of Indians does not put an end to it. We have exterminated a handful each year ever since I can remember; but it has not had the slightest effect upon the general question whether the Indian can be so managed as not to repeat these outrages. I hope no one will hesitate in an effort to put this down or any other effort that shall secure peace and tranquillity.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I do not understand the purpose of the resolution offered by the Senator from Florida. If it is simply the declaration of the general principle that the Government is bound to afford protection to its citizens against wrongs and outrages perpetrated by Indians or any other people, it is not necessary, because that has long been recognized as one of the axioms of government. If it is intended to cast any imputation by indirection or innuendo upon the Executive or upon the Department of the Interior by insinuating that proper measures have not been taken to protect the people of the Territory of Arizona from outrages by Apache Indians, I protest against its adoption until there has been further information obtained from the Department competent to advise us. I therefore move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, with directions to inquire and report what further steps are necessary to protect the property of the people of Arizona from outrages by Indians.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator from Kansas whether the reference had not better be to the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. INGALLS. I change the motion as suggested by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the motion of the Senator from Kansas ought to prevail. As he has said, the resolution would seem to be simply an affirmation of that which every man assents to, but if it be passed in its present shape, there can be no excuse for making such an affirmation unless it is intended to cover a reflection upon the Executive or upon the War Department for not having taken promptly those efficient measures that should have been taken to suppress these hostilities.

Now, sir, so far as we know, and I call upon the Senator from Florida if he has further information than the rest of us, prompt measures have been taken, and as I understand troops from other parts of the country are now being concentrated in Arizona, in order that the Army may be used promptly and efficiently for putting down the Indian bands that are in hostility. It seems to me, then, that it is unjust to those who, so far as we know, have taken prompt measures to suppress these hostilities and outrages, that the Senate should pass such a resolution without inquiry by some appropriate committee as to whether the proper efforts are not already being made. Therefore I hope that the motion of the Senator from Kansas will prevail and that this resolution may go to the Military Committee so that we may ascertain what has been done by the War Department and the President.

Mr. CALL. I wish to say that I had no purpose of casting any reflection on the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Interior. That never entered into my mind, nor does the resolution import such a reflection of itself. It does intimate that somebody, perhaps Congress, perhaps owing to a defect in the laws, perhaps owing to a defect in the system somewhere, has failed to exercise the power that would prevent the murder of the women and children of Arizona, and it does ask an expression on the part of Congress to the practical end, I will tell the Senator from Kansas, like all resolutions, that it may induce in this body and in the other body the bringing in of a bill for the purpose of giving the President, if necessary, such additional military force and such power as will secure the end of protection.

That is all I have to say. Ever since I have been a Senator, week after week information has come here of murders and horrible outrages upon the women and children of the Western Territories by Indians. While I am prepared to go with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] in all his schemes of education and amelioration, the power of the law, the military power of the country, I say to the Senator, ought to be exerted promptly and upon the moment, and the occurrence of these outrages is a disgrace and a scandal to the power of this Government and its administration of its functions. They ought not to be permitted to exist, and they can be easily remedied.

I hope the resolution will pass.

Mr. HAWLEY. The difficulty is that the Senator from Florida is not proposing to censure the entire people of the United States, ourselves included, but he is proposing virtually to censure the Executive and the Army under the charge of the Executive. I have not the slightest doubt that any investigation we might undertake would show that the President and the officers of the Army in the Southwest have done all within their power, and done it with promptness and with intelligence and with courage. There is an incidental question to be discussed, to be sure, that we might consider more profitably, I think sometimes, and that is whether we have not made our Army too small to properly protect the citizens of the region where the Indians disturb. We are obliged to break the Army up, to keep little fractions of fifty or one hundred or one hundred and fifty scattered over a region some two thousand miles square perhaps, and whenever any serious conflict breaks out there is a heavy bill for transportation, and there is necessarily a considerable delay in getting together a sufficient force to surround and capture those who cause the trouble. We have acted as if we thought it was not fair to bring sufficient numbers against them; as if when one hundred of these men took to the mountains we ought not to send over one hundred soldiers against them, whereas, in my opinion, it ought to be possible to combine a thousand men immediately and surround and cut off the mischief-makers. We have made our Army too small for all these Western purposes of an army. I am utterly unwilling to vote for any resolution here which can impliedly, not to say directly, censure the Executive and the brave and honorable gentlemen at the head of that portion of the Army, who have done all they could.

I hope, certainly, the resolution will be referred.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, this morning the Judiciary Committee made a report, through the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] upon this matter, brought to our attention by a message from the President of the United States, sent in since the resolution of the Senator from Florida was offered. I think that report covers the entire ground and meets everything that the Senator from Florida would desire. The President transmitted to the Senate certain information——

Mr. CALL. That was in regard to civil authorities, not the Indians.

Mr. GARLAND. The whole business. It is with that view that the Committee on the Judiciary made a report that under the existing law, if the civil authorities could not do what is necessary to be done, the President has the authority to call in the aid of the military to bring peace to that country. My information is that the trouble is not confined, as the resolution of the Senator from Florida is, to Arizona alone, because New Mexico is affected in the same way. I think the Senate, so far as any expression of opinion is concerned, should simply give its affirmation to the report made this morning by the Judiciary Committee, and the whole ground will be covered. This message came in after the Senator from Florida introduced his resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

DR. A. SIDNEY TEBBS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first case on the Calendar under the Anthony rule will be called.

The bill (S. No. 296) for the relief of Dr. A. Sidney Tebbs was announced as first in order, and its consideration was resumed as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. EDMUNDS to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 21, noes 19.

Mr. MAXEY called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to have the bill read, so that we may know what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been under consideration for a couple of days. It will be read.

The Acting Secretary read the bill and the amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I wish to submit a few remarks upon this bill. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] in the discussion of this bill said the other day:

I think that the rebellion being over, and over for good, it is better to preserve some everlasting monument that there was a right side and a wrong side to it.

If that be true, if it be a matter of sound policy, if there is any interest to the United States or to the preservation of this Government that this bill ought not to pass, and that the act it proposes to repeal should remain as it is, excluding certain classes of persons who went into the rebellion and civil war from holding military office, then I should not be in favor of its passing; but if, on the contrary, there is no warrant of precedent in history, if there is no truth in the argument that has been made by the Senator from Vermont that there ought to be some everlasting monument of the rebellion, then we ought to pass this bill.

Now, I venture to say that there is neither reason for the proposition he has stated, nor has it the warrant of any precedent in history, nor has it the commendation of any enlightened statesman or the past. Why, sir, the whole history of both Old and New England, which have achieved so much in the tide of time for the advancement of the best interests of mankind, contradicts the proposition of the honorable Senator. The very inception of our American liberty is to be found in a Declaration by which resistance to established authority upon the basis of conscientious conviction is declared to be one of the highest and most commendable of all the acts which human nature is capable of; and I say so far from the proposition of the Senator from Vermont being true, it is absolutely false. The history of this country shows that the very inception of our liberties and our form of Government was in a resistance to established authority based upon conscientious conviction of the propriety of that resistance.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator mean to argue that the war of American Independence was waged from the same platform as that of the rebellion against the Government?

Mr. CALL. Yes, sir; I do.

Mr. INGALLS. I want to understand the Senator.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Florida not only intends to argue it——

Mr. INGALLS. I believe there have been some monuments erected to the victors in that strife, however.

Mr. CALL. What strife?

Mr. INGALLS. The war of the Revolution.

Mr. CALL. Well, what of that?

Mr. INGALLS. The Bunker Hill monument.

Mr. CALL. What does that amount to?

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator I understand to be arguing against the doctrine that monuments should be erected to the victors in any civil strife.

Mr. CALL. I was not going to argue any such absurd proposition as that.

Mr. INGALLS. I understood that.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Vermont's proposition was that everlasting monuments should be put up for the purpose of putting to shame a part of the people engaged in that strife because they followed their conscientious convictions. I say no monuments in the shape of legislative proscriptions; as many monuments as you please to courage, to honorable self-sacrifice, and to conscientious convictions of right, but no monuments to punish men for liberty of thought and the heroism of following their convictions. That is what I say.

Mr. President, I find the following names to this Declaration of Independence—of rebellion: Josiah Bartlett, William Whipple, Matthew Thornton, Samuel Adams, John Adams, Stephen Hopkins, William Ellery, and a number of others, and the very beginning and the very monument upon which we have erected our Constitution and our form of government is a declaration of the absolute falsehood of the proposition that the people who engaged in the late civil war or rebellion, because they followed an honest conviction, are to be forever branded as criminal, or to be proscribed in the slightest degree, or to be prohibited from entering into the Army or from eminent civil or military service. I say there is no warrant either for the philosophy or theory of the proposition, or for the practice of it, which is put forth by the Senator from Vermont as a reason against the passage of the bill and the repeal of the law prohibiting men who were in the military service of the United States and of the Confederate States from being restored to the Army of the United States.

Mr. INGALLS. Does not the Senator from Florida know that at the close of the war of the Revolution those who in this country sided with England had their estates confiscated and were driven from the country and prevented from ever taking any subsequent part in the Government? If he does not he is greatly ignorant of the plainest facts of history.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Florida knows the contrary of that proposition to be true. The Senator knows that while there may have been instances here and there the whole course of our legislation has been from that time to the commencement of the civil war, so far as law was concerned, to allow the same immunities, privileges, rights, and considerations to those who were for and those who were against the independence of the Colonies; and the Senator knows also that some of the most distinguished men and families who have been in the service of this country and of the States were those who took part with England in the war of independence.

Let that be as it may, the Declaration of Independence says:

When, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume, among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

The Senator from Vermont—and it has been the habit on this floor to make similar statements, and I think that it is quite time that it should cease—went on to say:

It is not the person of this individual who seeks to be an officer, or of any Senator, or of any man anywhere, that I have anything to do with; but I cannot get it out of my mind that the future welfare of this country is in a large measure dependent upon our adhering now to the idea that the Government did achieve the success that it achieved, and that it achieved it upon the principles that it proceeded upon then, liberty and equality.

Mr. President, if this Government proceeded in that war upon the proposition of asserting liberty and equality, contrary to the Constitution of the United States and in defiance of its provisions; if the war was to assert liberty and equality, who were the traitors to the Government and the Constitution? Will any man of truth say that the Constitution of the United States in the beginning of the war proclaimed equality and liberty to all the people of this country? We know that it did not; we know that proposition is not true, and we are here to speak the truth, and truth alone; and if the people who were engaged in that war are to be branded for party purposes, let us sometimes have the truth of history spoken. We know that President Lincoln declared in his very first inaugural to Congress, and time and again declared that the institution of slavery—not liberty, but slavery—should be perpetuated if the constitutional obligation of remaining in the Union by the States or returning to the Union was kept.

Why, then, proclaim what we know to be false? We know that the Government in its established policy declared that the war was for the maintenance of the Union, and not for the maintenance of liberty and equality. Why, then, should the Senator from Vermont undertake now to state a proposition of this character? Who proclaimed the "higher law?" Who said from that place which is now filled with so much ability by the distinguished and able Senators from Massachusetts that there was a higher law than the established authority of the Constitution of the country? I am alluding to it for the purposes of reason and argument. Who educated the Southern people to the opinion that if they believed their rights and the rights of the States as guaranteed by the Constitution were violated it was their duty as men to maintain the war?

I say to the Senator from Vermont that to New England, with its culture, its energy, and its great qualities, the moral responsibility of that war is as much due as to anything else. How can you escape it? Who taught the higher law? Who taught resistance to the Constitution? And if the Constitution and Government of the United States had been administered by that party who believed that slavery could be carried into the Territories and they had so affirmed by positive laws, will the Senator from Vermont say that it would have been treason for which an everlasting monument of shame should be erected on the part of the Northern people for believing that slavery was an evil that was destructive to the Government and to the principles of the Government although sustained and sanctioned by its direct provisions? Will the Senator from Vermont say that he would have been found perpetuating forever and extending the institution of slavery and denouncing those men who defied and resisted the established authority of Government for conscience' sake as worthy of everlasting shame? Is it thus that he denounces John Brown?

Mr. President, we know that it is not true. We know that conscientious conviction has made the "army of martyrs," and that it is the touch-stone of meritorious conduct everywhere and upon all occasions throughout the history of the world that men must do what they believe conscientiously to be right, and that they are not to be branded with disgrace, but to be honored for it. I say that earnest, honest, truthful conviction, be it wrong or right, is the great motive power for elevating honorable human action.

But, Mr. President, it has never been in any country, it is not in the history of mankind that in times of conquest, whether the war was created in right or in wrong, whether it was justifiable by one view or to be condemned by another, it is without the sanction of history, it is without the sanction of the approval of enlightened men anywhere, that as monuments of war, shame and opprobrium are, even in the slightest degree, to be attached to those who were unsuccessful. I read from a book which contains, by the acknowledgment of all critics, a collection of the learning upon the subject of war, the rights of the conquering and the conquered, the policies which have been most successful and which are in conformity with wise and with just opinions, Montesquieu in his Spirit of Laws:

As soon as a republic has compassed the destruction of those who wanted to subvert it there should be an end of terrors, punishments, and even of rewards.

* * * * * * *

Under pretense of avenging the republic's cause, the avengers would establish tyranny. The business is not to destroy the rebel, but the rebellion. They ought to return as quick as possible into the usual track of government, in which every one is protected by the laws and no one injured.

Again he says, alluding to the eastern nations, where war has been chronic:

In order to prevent the vanquished nation from falling into despair, the victors from growing insolent and proud, the government from becoming military, and to contain the two nations within their duty, the Tartar family now on the throne of China has ordained that every military corps in the provinces should be composed half of Chinese and half Tartars, to the end that the jealousy between the two nations may keep them within bounds. The courts of judicature are likewise half Chinese and half Tartars. This is productive of several good effects. The two nations are a check to one another. They both preserve the civil and military power, and one is not destroyed by the other. The conquering nation may spread itself without being weakened and lost. It is likewise enabled to withstand civil and foreign wars. The want of so wise an institution as this has been the ruin of almost all the conquerors that ever existed.

Again, referring to the conduct of Alexander:

He opposed those who would have had him treat the Greeks as masters and the Persians as slaves. He thought only of uniting the two nations and of abolishing the distinctions of a conquering and a conquered people. After he had completed his victories he relinquished all those prejudices that had helped him to obtain them. He assumed the manners of the Persians, that he might not chagrin them too much by obliging them to conform to those of the Greeks.

Nothing consolidates a conquest more than this. Then why is it? Because we seek to affect the popular prejudice, that we seek to perpetuate these distinctions, that we will exclude a man who was in the Army of the United States and educated at West Point. Why? Because he had been taught by the history of this country, by a great political party, by many members of the Republican party itself, that to resist in certain cases was not only lawful in the sense of a higher law of moral duty, but right as a measure of policy. Will anybody venture to say that in the discussions upon the fugitive slave law resistance to authority time and again, based upon conscientious conviction, was not maintained in public and in private action; that resistance to the perpetuation and extension of slavery against the authority of government was not inculcated in every form in which the public mind could be influenced?

We are now in the Senate of the United States; seventeen years have passed; we are to seek truth; we are not to proclaim falsehood; we are to examine propositions in the light of history and with an intelligent judgment. I ask, then, who will undertake to say that there was no authority, that there was no teaching in the examples of the war of Independence for those people who honestly believed that it was necessary for the preservation of themselves and their families and their constitutional rights that they should make a war, that there was anything to be condemned in point of morality? The authority of government in all ages has been that of force, and is properly that of force. The Government of the United States was established by our fathers upon the principle of a rightful resistance to established authority, a resistance based upon conscientious convictions, and that it provided forces by which the power of the Government should be asserted, and those forces were the forces of combined action of military power, and not of moral stigmas or disgrace for courageous adherence to honest belief. In the whole history of this country, in New England or elsewhere, there is no philosophy that teaches that when an honest, conscientious conviction, having reasonable ground, exists, there is anything wrong in maintaining that honest belief even to the sacrifice of life.

Mr. President, the conduct which the act that this bill seeks to repeal stigmatizes with disgrace is the foundation and the inspiring motive, and will continue to be so for all time, of all patriotic devotion to your country. The almighty God alone controls the public mind. He alone can influence the source of thought and belief by the modes of education and training with which his providence surrounds us, and with which we are permitted to surround ourselves.

I read in the history of this country that in the war of 1812 the very doctrines which culminated in our late civil war, in that rebellion of the South for which an everlasting monument of shame is to be preserved in our laws, were proclaimed by a convention of the most eminent and distinguished men of New England. Who can deny it? And if these doctrines were taught, and taught by great statesmen, by judges; if the Supreme Court of the United States stood affirming the constitutional rights of those people to carry and maintain slavery in the Territories, and they believed these authoritative sources of instruction as to the powers and rights of the Government under the Constitution if the whole Government for half a century had been in that line of teaching as to their rights, why should they not believe it? Who shall condemn them for believing that which was taught by the established sources of instruction and authority under the Constitution, and who shall condemn them for following this belief even unto death? Will any Senator here deny that the Supreme Court of the United States instructed the Southern people that they had a right to carry slaves into all the Territories and to be protected by the national power?

It is now gravely insisted that there is no such thing as a right of revolution; that the man who conscientiously believes that he has a right to maintain the status which the Constitution and the laws have conferred upon him, and who follows that conviction to death; that a great public opinion which put the Government to its utmost exertion to subdue is to be treated as a moral disgrace; to those men who were following the teachings and the example of the war of Independence; that the men in the Army of the United States who were governed in their conduct by these authorized interpretations of constitutional power, right, and duty; who, when they found that the portion of the country to which they belonged and from which they had come, to which their families belonged, and in which their interests lay, had adopted a certain course of political action; that when, acting from the most honorable motives, they took part with them they became criminals and must not thereafter be trusted, and that a monument of shame for them must be preserved in the laws. There is no truth in such a proposition. It has not the countenance or approval in the policy of any civilized nation of which history furnishes us a record.

The great civil war originated in a series of causes which have no relation to the personal conduct of individuals. It arose in part from a theory which came from the manner in which our original form of Government was made, came from the fact that these colonies became political entities by virtue of the Revolution, from the fact that they first formed a confederation which was not a government, and that eminent men with great warrant and show of reason upon both sides at different times maintained that construction and interpretation of these facts which resulted in the conclusion that when a State proposed to assume political power again, absolute sovereign political power to itself, there was no authority in the Government to deny it, no authority by force of arms to enforce the authority of the Constitution and the Union. But whether that proposition was right or whether it was wrong does not matter in any degree to the truth of the proposition that those who so believed had a warrant for their belief and a reasonable warrant for it.

Mr. President, whether these men are judged by the standard of high moral conduct, or whether they are judged by a political standard, they are not properly subjects of any stigma or disgrace; their good faith, their loyalty to their convictions of right is not impeached to any extent. Justice to a man who was willing to sacrifice his life for his duty, and who left the United States Army to enter into the service of the confederacy, requires us to respect his convictions as we do those of the man who remained in the Army from a like conviction of duty.

It is the worst of narrow and impotent legislation to attempt to restrain the honest and reasonable judgment and opinions of men. No wise statesman has ever sought to do so, for they have ever seen that the tides of public opinion and individual opinion are moved by causes other than punitive laws, are moved by great principles of belief which have their origin in education, which are prepared by degrees, and which do not in a moment leap into existence in the human heart. He who proposes to so treat a political movement in which millions of men concurred, and in which they engaged with the most profound sincerity of belief and conviction, is a narrow-minded man, and not capable of conceiving the true principles upon which human action and public action are based.

If he seeks, as does the Senator from Vermont, to forbid the human mind from thinking otherwise than as his laws shall direct, or the human heart from acting otherwise than as the high inspiration of duty and right shall demand in obedience to sincere belief, he has indeed undertaken a mighty task and one strangely at variance with all the philosophy and teachings of his own New England.

Mr. President, there is no sound reason for the opposition to the passage of this bill. The time has passed when we should any longer be acrimonious to each other. We should now stand upon a common platform, as far as devotion to our country is concerned, forgetting the war except in the fact to which everything is a monument; that the authority of the Government is re-established, and established upon the basis of perpetuity; that we now have agreed as the result of the trial of war that the Government of the United States is sovereign for the purposes of the Constitution, and may enforce and properly enforce with the combined power of all the States and people the obedience of each individual and of every State to whatsoever its established authorities shall lawfully ordain.

That is the monument which the war has accomplished; and to undertake to treat as a criminal a man because he was educated at West Point and in the Army, who honestly believed it was his duty to join the confederacy, is not the part of wisdom or patriotism. Take the case of Robert E. Lee. Who will deny that he was a man who had no superior in the honesty of his convictions, in his willingness to sacrifice his life and all that was dearer than life to the maintenance of those convictions? Who will deny that Stonewall Jackson was the peer of any in purity of purpose, in sublime devotion to his belief as to what his duty to God and his country required? The man who shall be able to stand in the grand assize of the future by Stonewall Jackson or Robert E. Lee, and lay his hand upon his heart and say, "I was your superior or your peer in all the noble qualities of human nature," I think will have none to make him ashamed.

There is no warrant for this prejudice in any sound argument; there is no warrant for it in any enlightened system of public policy; there is no warrant for it in the history of the past. The war should be treated in the light of the example of other nations who have been conquerors; treated as if it had never occurred so far as the rights, the privileges, and the immunities of every citizen are concerned. In Montesquieu it is said that this wise and humane policy has been carried so far among the most enlightened nations and even the semi-civilized nations of the earth that even in the constitution of the judicial tribunals, as well as the political and the military, the vanquished have had the benefit of their own laws administered by their own courts. Differing from us, they have been careful to select judges from the conquered themselves, and to establish over them for the administration of the laws judges seelcted from their own people, sharing their prejudices, sympathizing with them in their feelings and their opinions. That has been the established policy of all, except those nations that have received the condemnation of every enlightened statesman and jurist; and while this Government and this people have commended themselves, as the Senator from Vermont has said, by a bloodless triumph, and while it is an attestation of the civilization and the improvement of the age, it is also true that under party influence they have kept up and maintained a series of distinctions and disfranchisements and ineligibility to judicial power and civil and military preferment which have no authority in reason, no warrant in precedent, no support in the opinions of humane, learned men in all the history of the world from the time of Cicero to the present day, in which they have sought to perpetuate what they call monuments, of the right or wrong.

Why, sir, who will decide? If we were to undertake a just judgment here, if we were to take New England men, if we were to take Charles Sumner and bring him to the witness stand and ask him if, instead of seceding in 1861, the Southern States had remained with Congress and the Supreme Court, if Mr. Lincoln had died and Mr. Hamlin had been removed by death, and a new President by a union of the Democracy with their large majority, had been elected, and they had maintained with the power of the Government the perpetuation of slavery and its extension throughout the Territories of the country, is there any man who will tell us that Charles Sumner with his declaration of the higher law would not, if he could, have resisted the authority of the Government?

We know that the enlightened opinion of the North, the just judgment of the North, as they saw and understood the question, would have demanded their heroic conviction to duty, their self-sacrifice, the grand character with which New England had impressed herself upon civilization everywhere, would have demanded that they should have done what the Southern people did—oppose in arms the power of the national Government, and resist the extension of slavery under the authority of the Union. They ought to have done it; they would not have been true to themselves and their character had they not have done it; and shall we say now that they would have justly been subject to severe punishment, or to punishment at all, for following those convictions?

Mr. President, there is no reason in this kind of argument; there is no reason why the last vestige of the legislation of the war should not be done away with; there is no reason why all punitive legislation, all differential legislation growing out of the war, should not be carefully stricken from the statute-book. If there is any practical result to be accomplished, if you need punitive laws for the purpose of preserving or protecting the rights in future of any individual, that is one question; but it is not a question that arises because of the war. It is not a question that has its origin in anything that occurred in the war. It is simply a question of present duty. I say, therefore, Mr. President, that I think there ought to be no hesitation in passing this bill. There can be no object in its reference to any committee. A committee can do nothing but recommend either its passage or its defeat. I understand it is unanimously reported now by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY. Oh, no.

Mr. CALL. It does not matter much whether it is a unanimous report or not; it is reported by the committee at any rate; but if it was not reported by anybody, that is no reason why it should not pass. No man can give a reason for saying that a monument of the right or wrong shall be preserved. What monument is it? It is a monument that the Congress of the United States and the President concurring, in the height of the angry feelings of the war, asserted that it should be the law of this country that a man who had been in the military service of the United States, had been educated at West Point, had taken the oath of allegiance, had filled certain positions toward the Government, and was therefore understood to be under greater obligations than others, and who served the confederacy, should never be admitted to a place in the Army or restored to office again, but that he should die with this opprobrium upon him.

What does that say? It says that such a man acted dishonorably and unfaithfully and that he cannot be trusted in the future, and that in order to mark to future generations the public sense of this disgrace, the law shall say, "If you do what the people of New England did, if you do what the people of the Colonies did and what they have transmitted to you as the highest glory and your first duty, if when your people in large numbers and with almost unanimity, constituting nearly half in a country of twenty millions of people, if in a time of great commotion when nearly one-half that people shall conclude, right or wrong, that they are oppressed, that the laws have been wrested from their proper function and are used for their oppression, if you entertain that honest belief, shall follow it out in action, you shall be forever disgraced.

And this though the teachings of the Declaration of Independence are that it will be your duty, your honor, and your glory to so act, and though in all your religious teachings, in the example and precept of those whom we reverence as the noble army of martyrs, in the whole system of our civilization which seeks to inspire correct motives and devotions, you have been so taught, yet we shall punish you by a perpetual monument for not following the opinions of other men's consciences as to your duty and for being true to your own. The whole foundation of our system of religion, of civil government, is in following conscientiously and with devotion, careless of power, careless of life, careless of every sacrifice; following the convictions of our own minds as to right and duty, we seek to educate these aright in order that we may not go wrong. That is the lever, that is the corrective. But no man, no country, no time will ever say that he who in time of a great civil commotion follows his own honest belief in company with a great multitude of his own people and offers his life as a sacrifice, pursues even to death this conviction of his duty, that such a man is other than an example of the highest qualities which constitute the character of a great people, and which are the security and foundation of our American liberties to-day and are necessary to the perpetuity of the Union and the Constitution.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, if this bill can be passed with the general consent of both sides of this Chamber, and by the joint action of all sections of the Union, it would be a great boon to the country. From what has already occurred in this debate I have some fear that this cannot be be done, though what fell from the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] some days ago gives me some hope of a result so much to be desired. Whatever may be its fate I shall support it, regretting that its good effects may be lessened by a want of unanimity in its passage.

It is now more than seventeen years, nearly the life of a generation, since the last gun was fired in the late fratricidal war. During all this time the supreme authority of the Union has been recognized and obeyed everywhere in the South; and that, too, when powers were exercised of doubtful constitutionality and of undoubted severity, not to say hostility to the people of the South. The Federal Government has done everything deemed by the party in power necessary for the security of the Union, or even expedient to perpetuate its own supremacy. There have been local disturbances, it is true, arising out of the extraordinary friction occasioned by the total subversion of the government and institutions of the Southern States, and their reconstruction upon a basis extremely variant from the habits, modes of thought, and traditions of the Southern people, not to say of the people of the whole country.

But during this trying period, when the venality, corruption, incompetency, and want of sympathy, and I may add the hostility of those who exercised the powers of these States, would have produced a revolution in any country inhabited by the Anglo-Saxon race, the national authority whenever and wherever asserted, however ungraciously and however manifestly for mere partisan purposes, was uniformly obeyed. Without intending to reopen a discussion of the events of that unhappy period, without intending to fix and apportion the blame for what then happened, I hope I may be pardoned for saying that I hope no such calamity may again befall any portion of the American people, or in fact any other people however hostile. It gives me no pleasure to take this retrospect. I would rather dismiss it as I would the memory of a horrid nightmare, a dreadful and distressing dream in which the soul had been made to suffer the torments of the damned. If any man shall say we were responsible for this condition of things, I shall not turn aside now to dispute with him; I shall leave him to enjoy what pleasure he may from his imaginings.

The bitterness engendered by war and this unhappy period has now passed, and as I hope forever. This is certainly so as to the business and social relations of the people. Northern and Southern men and women meet and mingle every day without the slightest remembrance of the bitter past. Northern capital seeking new fields of profitable employment is now being freely invested in the South, and the trade and productions of the South are filling the coffers of Northern merchants and manufacturers with almost fabulous wealth. The sentiment of Union, founded on consent and a conviction of its advantages, is stronger now than ever before in our history.

Under these favoring circumstances this bill is recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs, a committee composed of patriotic and conscientious Senators, nearly all of whom were in the late war, able, gallant, and trusted leaders in one or the other of the contending armies. The bill relates exclusively to the Army, and the recommendation to pass it has the sanction of that committee, to whose judgment we are accustomed to defer in such matters. This recommendation is opposed here. Certainly, sir, there ought to be some good reason to justify a rejection of this recommendation. I think there is no such reason.

The bill proposes a repeal of section 1218 of the Revised Statutes, which reads as follows——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The hour of two o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move that the Senator from Mississippi be allowed to conclude his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Senator from Mississippi will proceed.

Mr. HOAR. What is the request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That the Senator from Mississippi be permitted to conclude his remarks.

Mr. HOAR. I beg pardon. That does not displace the regular order after he has concluded? ["Oh, no!"]

Mr. GEORGE. I shall occupy but a few moments longer. The statute reads as follows:

> No person who has served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion, shall be appointed to any position in the Army of the United States.

It has been shown, sir, by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] that under the rules regulating the ages of appointees in the Army this section can have no practical effect but to exclude from appointment persons who were not exceeding fourteen years of age at the commencement of the war and who at that tender age may have served in some civil capacity, for such persons were too young for military service, except possibly for a few months preceding the close of the war. The statute sought to be repealed is, therefore, directed solely at persons who were beardless boys at the time they are supposed to have committed the sin of civil or military service in behalf of the States in which they were born. This, sir, I repeat, is its sole effect, so far as it relates to the organization of the Army.

It is claimed, however, by the opponents of the bill that the section sought to be repealed has a moral and political effect which justifies its retention on the statute-book. It is argued that there is a right side and a wrong side in the late war, and that this section should be retained as a perpetual monument of the rightfulness of the Northern and the sinfulness of the Southern side. Until I heard this objection I had supposed that the right and the wrong in this matter, as in all others, were to be settled in foro conscientiæ, by arguments addressed to reason, and not by an ex post facto statute, born of the passions and directed against the fears of men. But however this may be, if monuments perpetual or ephemeral are necessary to show to the world and to posterity the right and the wrong side of the late war, are there not enough for this purpose outside of this section, which, in the spirit of vengeance and distrust, imposes a penalty on the vanquished with no compensating advantage to the victor? On whatever side we turn our eyes we behold monuments which tell the story of victory to the one side and defeat to the other; and so far as might makes right (which I believe is the rule now) they also serve to fix the right and the wrong.

In this city, the capital of the Union, are erected, in enduring bronze or marble, statues of the heroes of the winning side. In every Southern State are costly and magnificent cemeteries, in which a grateful country has deposited the bones of her gallant dead who had fallen on the side of the victor, when, in many instances, not even a rude stone, not a green mound, marks the spot which holds the ashes of the brave men of the South who gave their lives for what was to them a just and holy cause.

If you of the North want monumental laws to tell of your victory you have them in the three amendments to the Constitution. You know what they are. I need not repeat them.

On the statute-book there are also many of these monumental laws granting pensions to the Union soldiers—pensions paid out of a treasury supplied by taxation on the South as well as on the North, while the maimed Southern soldier and the helpless widows and orphans of those who fell in battle or died since from wounds, if unable to support themselves, must depend on the charity of an impoverished people or seek refuge from starvation in the poor-house. The South makes no complaint of this. We neither object to the nation's generous bounties to Union soldiers, nor do we ask the national aid for our own. These laws are monuments of Northern victory and Southern defeat; but they are monuments also of beneficence, of gratitude for great services and great sacrifices.

But this law sought to be repealed by this bill is not of that character. It confers no benefits, it bears no testimony of a nation's gratitude, it attests no admiration for heroic services, it breathes no spirit of generosity or magnanimity, it adds no jewel to the chaplet on the victor's brow, but brands, or attempts to brand, with an ineffaceable stain the honor and the faith of 10,000,000 of American citizens. It is only hatred and vengeance. What do you men of the North gain by this degradation or attempted degradation of the South? What does the country gain by it? Is this a united country, or is it divided into discordant and hostile sections? Are we of the South citizens or only subjects? Are we to have a country or are we to be outcasts in the land of our birth, dishonored and distrusted? Do you demand humiliating and degrading concessions as the price of equal American citizenship? If so, we refuse to pay it, even for that great boon.

Sir, we acknowledge no inferiority. We confess to no crime; we profess no repentance; we ask no forgiveness. But we acknowledge our defeat, and we acknowledge also that separation is no longer desirable. We acknowledge the superior power which compelled us to remain in the Union; but we deny the right to make us inferior in political privileges, or less in the dignity and nobility of American manhood than the proudest and best among the victors.

We may have erred, sir; I shall not discuss that now. But if we erred we committed the fault of freemen jealous of their rights. Our cause was just and holy to us, and it was defended with a courage, endurance, and self-denial which bring honor, not shame, on American manhood. If fidelity to the convictions of conscience, if courage and endurance in adverse fortune, if a heroic devotion to principle sincerely entertained, if love of country, if veneration for the memory and example of a great and glorious ancestry, be titles to the respect and admiration of mankind, the conduct of the Southern people in the late war is worthy to be recorded on the same bright page of the history of the human race on which are written the grand achievements of the North. It cannot be made the just ground of a charge of dishonor or infidelity to truth.

Sir, whatever aspirations we may have indulged for separation and independence have been abandoned forever. Whatever hostility we may have had for the Union has been surrendered. You of the North have said that this broad land—all of it—shall be one country. You have said it shall be your country and our country, the common country of the American people. We accept this decree in good faith. We accept it without reservation, in all the length and breadth and depth of its significance. We understand it to mean that the Union shall be yours, and it shall also be ours; that its blessings and its glories are the common heritage of all; that its burdens and its high duties shall alike be borne and alike be discharged by all. Forgetting the bitterness of the past, remembering only that in the late war which honored and ennobled American manhood, we mean to serve the Union faithfully in peace, contributing to our utmost to the progress, prosperity, and happiness of all its people, and to defend it with our lives and our fortunes in war. We make no quarrel with the convictions, the sentiments, and beliefs of our brethren of the North, and we claim a like toleration for ours.

If you, men of the North, will forget the bitterness of the war, remembering only the courage, the sacrifices, the heroic endurance which marked the conduct of both sides, we of the South, citizens of a restored Union, will claim a share in the glories won in that fratricidal conflict by our countrymen in the Union armies, and will yield you a share in the glories no less grand won by the South.

If you are unwilling to do this, then you must remember that while you have a just pride in the achievements of the great and brave on your side, we have no less pride in the achievements of ours.

We are but men, and we have the passions, the sympathies and affections of men. We were vanquished. The fruits of the contest to us have been the overthrow of our institutions, the desolation of our homes, the bitter anguish of the memory of great sacrifices, which brought only defeat and disappointment. Little else remains for us than the melancholy reflection that we deserved, though we did not achieve, success.

This statute is especially irritating to the people of the South, not because there are any great number whom it excludes from appointment in the Army, but because it contains an imputation upon our honor; it asserts that men who served the South in any way during the war cannot be trusted to defend the country now. And then, too, it is said that this statute must be perpetual. If, then, war should come, are the people of the South to be excluded from the defense of the country? Or, if admitted, are they to serve only as privates in the ranks? I scarcely think that Senators who oppose the repeal mean this.

If they do they will reject a leadership in war for troops, who, under it, on a hundred fields of carnage and blood, have illustrated the skill, courage, and endurance of the highest type of American soldiers. If they do not mean this, then they mean to keep the statute in force only in peace, to repeal it at the first blast of war. This would be to say that Southern men cannot be trusted in the Army in peace, but are entitled to full trust in war. To that absurdity does this position lead. I sincerely trust that this bill will pass, as also the bill which proposes to repeal the statute requiring Northern men whose fidelity to the Union has never been questioned to take an oath deny ing all sympathy with what they deem an unjustifiable rebellion.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. JOHN BAILEY, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 176) to refund certain duties paid upon military uniforms imported by and for use of Company G, Sixth Regiment Infantry Illinois National Guards; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4704) for the relief of P. F. Lonergan.

The message also announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3208) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. W. H. FORNEY of Alabama, Mr. J. H. KETCHAM of New York, and Mr. THOMAS RYAN of Kansas, the conferees on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3548) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 420) to establish a court of appeals.

Mr. PLUMB. Before the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the unfinished business I wish to state that I was unavoidably absent on Friday when the vote was taken on the Chinese bill. If I had been present I should have voted for the bill on its passage.

I wish now to give notice that after the pending unfinished business has been concluded I shall move to take up the bill (S. No. 67) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain and certify the amount of land located with military warrants in the States described therein, and for other purposes, commonly known as the 5-per cent. bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 420) to establish a court of appeals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is reported by the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, I had the honor to submit for the consideration of the Senate a bill to establish a court of appeals. It was referred to the Judiciary Committee, where it was subjected to a severe scrutiny, and I was directed by the committee to report it with sundry amendments. As they do not affect its framework, but are designed by perfecting its details to render its practical working more efficient and acceptable, I presume that every Senator who approves its general scope and design will acquiesce in them. I proceed therefore to consider the bill as if they had been adopted, and ask the indulgence of the Senate to some considerations which, in my judgment, commend it to the favor and support of Congress.

A preliminary question arises as to the necessity of legislation. If the existing organization of our judicial system be insufficient to meet the wants of the country, all will concur that it is the imperative duty of Congress to furnish the needed corrective. Just laws are a blessing, but they cannot be fully enjoyed unless adequate provision is made for the prompt and efficient administration of justice according to law.

Our present system has not been essentially changed since the act of March 8, 1802, was passed after the memorable debate on the judiciary bill. The subsequent modifications will be the subject of remark before I resume my seat.

When the illustrious Marshall entered upon his duties as the head of the American judiciary there were pending for adjudication in the Supreme Court ten cases. The first volume of Cranch, exclusive of the appendix, which contains an elaborate discussion of a question of commercial law, consists of but three hundred and sixty-six pages, and it embraces all the cases adjudged at three terms, commencing with the August term, 1801, and in nearly all of them the arguments of counsel are given at considerable length. In the succeeding years the business increased but slowly, the average being less than sixty cases a year, and at times it hardly seemed to keep pace with the growth and development of the country. In 1810 there were 98 cases on the docket; in 1820, 127; in 1830, 143; in 1840, 92; in 1850, 253; in 1860, 310; in 1870, 636; in 1880, 1,202, and at the present term 1,204. The late Mr. Justice Catron told me that when he was appointed a member of that court in 1837 there were but 37 cases upon its docket of that term. Since the year 1850 they have, as appears by the preceding statement, increased very rapidly.

The reported cases adjudged at the last term fill two volumes, one of seven hundred and eighty-two and the other of nine hundred and four pages, and but a very limited space is allowed for the arguments of counsel. The causes which have led to the extraordinary increase in the business of the court are to a great extent still in active operation and others are constantly arising, so that we cannot, under existing laws, cherish the expectation that its amount will be diminished, or that a case called in its regular order can be determined in much less than three years after it has been docketed. This prolonged delay amounts practically to a denial of justice to individual litigants, and the cases often involve questions of importance to the whole country, the determination of which is unavoidably postponed to the evident prejudice of the public interests.

These acknowledged evils can in no manner be ascribed to the learned justices of that court. No men in the public service are more faithful and laborious than they are. Each session commences in October, and closes toward the middle of May, when they repair to their respective circuits. Notwithstanding their strenuous exertions there is at the close of every year a larger number of undecided cases upon the docket than there was at its commencement.

It may be said that in the supreme courts of some of the States cases equally numerous are either instituted or are removed there by appeal or by writ of error; but the mere number of cases in a State court furnishes no measure by which to estimate the labors of the Supreme Court of the United States. The jurisprudence of each State is essentially homogeneous, and the State judges who administer it are governed by one system of law, in the operation of which, as a general rule, questions arise to which their habitual studies and thoughts have been directed from the commencement of their professional life. Their duties are on familiar ground, and differ signally from that of a judge of our Supreme Court. His labors are not confined to the administration of the jurisprudence of a single State. They extend to all the States and Territories, differing, in some essential particulars from each other in their statutes, their unwritten law, their systems of practice, and their principles of adjudication. The statutes of a State are by Congress prescribed as rules of decision in the courts of the United States when there sitting in trials at law, and must therefore control the Supreme Court when it exercises its appellate jurisdiction in cases where those trials were had. A judge of the Supreme Court is thus not only required to administer the local law of the several States, but admiralty law, equity jurisprudence, patent and copyright law, the laws of nations, and the statutes relating to the revenue, to which may be added the French, the Spanish, and the Mexican land systems, as they apply to the titles to real estate in the territories acquired under our treaties with foreign powers.

And last, but not least, he is frequently called upon to enter on the domain of constitutional law, and to deal with matters exacting for their satisfactory determination, great breadth of thought, and a thorough mastery of the history and workings of our institutions, both State and Federal. Since the close of the civil war, how many novel, complex, and embarrassing questions of vital and enduring interest, to which that unhappy controversy and the recent amendments to the Constitution gave birth, have been presented for judicial determination, and what labor, anxious thought, and learning the just and wise solution of them required. When these arduous duties are considered, it is obviously impracticable to make a more rapid progress in the disposal of the business which can now be brought before that court, and which, with our increasing population, must inevitably accumulate, unless Congress furnishes a remedy.

Various plans have been proposed, some of them during the present session of Congress. The Supreme Court now consists of a Chief-Justice and eight associates. It is proposed by some to add three to that number. This would, in my opinion, subserve no good purpose. I have understood that in the supreme courts of some of the States having crowded dockets the practice of apportioning the cases among the judges prevails. Each judge examines the record of such only as are assigned to him. His conclusion upon the facts is reported to his brethren, and his opinion touching the law applicable to them, if it appears to be right and proper, is then, without their further examination, adopted as the opinion of the whole court. This has never been and, I trust, never will be the practice in our Supreme Court. Whether cases are argued orally or submitted on briefs, it is the duty of each judge by investigating for himself to master the facts, and in every instance to satisfy his own mind as to the law which should govern. The judges then meet in conference, where their respective views are stated, compared, and discussed. Until a result is reached in this form the opinion is not prepared. Where the court is unanimous that opinion, pronounced by one of its members, embodies the results of the separate examination, which each of them has made, and at all events the conclusions which a majority has reached when unanimity has not been attained. Adding, therefore, three members to the bench would give it no relief. They are now as numerous as is consistent with the proper dispatch of business, and the suggested increase, so far from expediting the decision of cases, would rather tend to procrastinate and retard it.

Another plan is to add twelve judges, so that the court shall consist of twenty-one, and to divide them into three sections, to each of which is to be assigned a particular class of cases, excepting those which involve a Federal question. The latter are to be heard by the whole court, whether they originate in an inferior court or are removed from a State court by writ of error. In the execution of this plan, the court may in most of the cases be considered as divided into three sections, and the judgments rendered in any one of them, if concurred in by six-sevenths of those constituting it, are declared to be final. Although to be reported to the full court, they are not subject there to any review. It is only when less than that proportion concurs that another section rehears the case. If these two are in conflict the case may be adjudicated in the third section, or, at the discretion of the court, may be heard by it.

These provisions for hearing and rehearing are so cumbrous, unwieldy, and necessarily attended with such delay that instead of furnishing increased facilities for the speedy disposal of cases they would in practice obstruct it. Where the decisions of the several sections are not subject to the reviewing power of the court, does not the contemplated plan make substantially and practically three distinct and independent tribunals of last resort? It has been so regarded by some of the most thoughtful inquirers, and if their views are correct is it not in palpable conflict with, or at least an adroit evasion of, the constitutional provision which vests the judicial power of the United States in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish? But even apart from this objection it is obvious that the opinions of a section would not command that moral weight and influence which those of the entire court have heretofore enjoyed and which have secured for it the merited confidence of the people. Conflicts of opinion will almost inevitably arise in the adjudications of the several sections and in the application of those general principles which are common to every class of cases. This cannot but impair the standing of the court. It is true that where, as before remarked, a "Federal question" is necessarily involved the case in which it arises is heard by the entire court. I submit with all becoming deference, however, that a tribunal of twenty-one members is not the best adapted for the consideration of such a question.

Another plan proposed is that there shall be designated by the President two assistant chief-justices, and that they and the Chief-Justice shall respectively preside over three divisions of the court, so that each shall be composed of one chief and two associate justices. It further provides that such a distribution shall, at the beginning of every term, be made by the Chief-Justice, and that he, with the aid of his two assistants, shall assign to the respective divisions, as nearly as may be, an equal amount of the business upon the docket in such manner that to one division all equity causes shall be assigned, to another common law causes, and to the third all admiralty and revenue causes, and those in which the Government of the United States is directly or indirectly a party. When, however, the matters prescribed by the record require a construction of the Constitution of the United States or a treaty therewith, and causes are brought on a writ of error to the supreme court of any State, they shall be considered in general session.

Under this plan each of the divisions sits separately, hears arguments, and pronounces judgments, and they may sit at the same time. It will be perceived that this does not, in some respects, differ essentially from the plan upon which I have just commented. No additional justices, however, are required to execute it. If two of the divisions before which the cause is argued concur their judgment becomes that of the court itself, unless the latter deems it proper to rehear the cause in general session, and then a majority of those who sit on such rehearing pronounces the judgment of the court. Two judges may therefore, in any given case, except under special contingencies, pronounce the judgment of the court. The objections to the plan are so obvious and insurmountable that I do not deem it necessary to enter upon an extended discussion of them.

Another plan contemplates the establishment of a circuit court of appeals and a national court of appeals, the latter consisting of the chief-justice and associate justices. It divides the national court into two divisions, designated as division 1 and division 2, and provides that division 1 shall consist of the chief-justice and eight or more associate justices, and division 2 of any nine or more associate justices. All the provisions of law now in force prescribing the cases wherein and modes whereby appeals may be taken, or writs of error sued out, for the review by the Supreme Court of a final judgment or decree, except as otherwise provided, apply to an appeal taken to or a writ of error sued out from the national court. It declares that the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court shall not extend to any case unless the value of the property or the amount in controversy, exclusive of interest and costs, exceeds $100,000.

Secondly. In all cases in which the justices hearing or trying the case, in either division of the national court of appeals, cannot come to a unanimous decision thereof, or wherein they are in doubt as to what decision should be rendered, and on that ground refer it to the Supreme Court for determination.

Thirdly. In all cases presenting a question which has been before decided by either branch of the national court of appeals, or by the Supreme Court, and a majority of the justices sitting in the division at the hearing of the case are of opinion that the former decision of the point should be overruled or reconsidered.

Fourthly. In all cases wherein the Supreme Court shall deem the question arising therein to be of sufficient importance to require an adjudication by the Supreme Court, whether such questions arise under the Constitution or any law or treaty of the United States, or otherwise.

Most of the objections which I have mentioned to the other schemes apply, in my judgment, with aggravated force to this one. It provides, it will be perceived, for two courts of appeals, increases the number of the judges of the Supreme Court to seventeen, and requires them to act, in the mode which I have stated, as members of the national court of appeals, in addition to the duties which they are required to discharge, as judges of the court of last resort.

Mr. President, these various schemes attest a widespread conviction that there is a necessity for immediate remedial legislation. I remarked that no essential change of our judicial system had been made since the commencement of the century, when our population was less than five and a half millions. Indeed the organization of the court under the act of September 24, 1789, which provided for a Chief-Justice and five associates, remained unchanged until, by the act of July 24, 1807, another was added. Two were added by the act of March 3, 1837, and the number has remained until the present time, except that from 1863 to 1869 there were nine.

The act of February 16, 1875, provided that thereafter the judgments and decrees of the inferior courts of the United States should not be re-examined in the Supreme Court, unless the matter in dispute should exceed the sum or value of $5,000, whereas by preceding legislation that sum or value was $2,000.

The act of April 10, 1869, provided for the appointment of nine circuit judges. Each has within his circuit the same power and jurisdiction as the associate justice allotted to it. This provision was chiefly designed to lessen the circuit labors of the Chief-Justice and associate justices, but it has neither diminished the number nor accelerated the decision of cases in the Supreme Court. These are the only changes made in the system since its establishment. Our population is now more than 50,000,000. Immense additions have in the intervening period been made to our territory, our manufacturing industry has been largely developed, and a network of railroads constructed throughout the whole country; the mining interests of the Pacific States have reached enormous proportions, and a court has been established for the adjudication of claims against the United States, with the right of ultimate appeal by either party to the Supreme Court.

The claims already passed upon exceed in the aggregate eighty millions of dollars. In view of these facts, it is not surprising that an impression universally prevails that an adequate provision for the prompt and efficient exercise of the judicial power of the United States does not exist. The remedy is in our hands. The framers of the Constitution wisely provided that Congress might establish inferior courts from "time to time." After bestowing much reflection upon the subject, and believing that action should be taken without delay, I have come to the conclusion that the bill which the Judiciary Committee has approved furnishes the most expedient remedy by establishing an intermediate court in each of the existing circuits, and providing for the appointment therein of two additional circuit judges. The proposed court will consist of the associate justice of the Supreme Court allotted to that circuit, the three circuit judges thereof, and two of the district judges, the latter to be designated by the order of the court at each term thereof to serve for the succeeding term. Any four of them, including at least one competent to preside, shall constitute a quorum. Appellate jurisdiction is conferred upon it over the final judgment or decree of any circuit or district court within the circuit when the amount claimed or the value of the property in controversy exceeds five hundred dollars, or when an appeal or writ of error now lies from such judgment or decree, or where the circuit or the district judge shall certify that the adjudication involves a question of general importance. The writ must be sued out or the appeal taken within six months after the entry of the judgment or decree, and the court is invested with power to reverse or modify the judgment or decree, or to render the proper one, or to direct the requisite proceedings to be had in the lower court.

When under the provision of the act an appeal could be taken to the court of appeals from a final decree in equity, an appeal may within thirty days from the date of an interlocutory order granting or refusing an injunction be taken therefrom. The court has authority to issue all writs necessary to the exercise of its jurisdiction; and the laws now in force touching appeals or writs of error, to or from the Supreme Court, are, if not otherwise provided, applicable to the court of appeals.

It will be perceived that the amplest provisions are made for the review of the action of the subordinate courts in civil cases. Under existing laws the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court cannot, except in certain classes of cases, be exercised, unless the sum or value of $5,000 is involved. This bill allows to the dissatisfied party the freest resort to an appellate court, which from the mode of its organization will be peculiarly well adapted for the exercise of the high trust committed to it. Its members will undoubtedly be able and experienced jurists, selected from the circuit, and conversant with the practice and the statutes which there prevail.

A writ of error may, if allowed by a judge of the court of appeals, be sued out within ninety days after a final judgment in a criminal case has been rendered. It cannot, however, be granted after an unsuccessful application therefor has been made to another judge. A singular anomaly will thus be removed from our judicial system. The appellate jurisdiction of our court of last resort is now confined to matters of contract and property and cannot be invoked in a criminal case, although it involves the good name, the personal liberty, and even the life of the accused. A specific question in regard to which the judges of the inferior court disagree may be certified in such a case for the opinion of the Supreme Court. If, however, they do not differ and the cause is within their jurisdiction, their action is final and conclusive. It is true that the prisoner, if a writ of habeas corpus in connection with a certiorari be awarded him, may cause the record to be sent up if the trial court has exceeded its jurisdiction and acted without authority in pronouncing judgment against him. The writ cannot, however, be made to subserve the general purposes of a writ of error and will not be granted to review the whole case. It lies solely to determine whether the court below had authority to act at all. (Ex Parte Virginia, 10 Otto, 339.)

The reasons which confine within such narrow limits the jurisdiction of our highest court in criminal cases and induce Congress to refrain from extending it so as to embrace them need not be discussed. It was, no doubt, believed that a grant of a broader jurisdiction would so cripple the court as to render the discharge of its other duties impracticable. Be that as it may, there can be no just cause for withholding from a convicted offender access to an appellate court. In every free country it is a fundamental maxim that punishment should not be inflicted for an alleged violation of law, unless the judgment of conviction be rendered in strict conformity with law. The bill secures under proper restrictions the right of a prisoner to a judicial review of his sentence, and I regard this provision as one of its most valuable features.

The establishment of intermediate courts in Illinois since the constitution of 1870 took effect has been attended with marked success. It has relieved the Supreme Court of a burden which was becoming too great for it to bear, and their decisions have been in general so satisfactory to the litigating parties that but a comparatively small fraction of the cases that were appealable to the Supreme Court have been removed there for re-examination. Such, I have no doubt, will be the results of a similar change in our system.

Under the provisions of this bill a writ of error or an appeal from every final judgment or decree of the court of appeals will within one year after it has been rendered lie to the Supreme Court, where the value or sum of $10,000, exclusive of costs, is in controversy, or where a Federal question is involved, or where the court certifies that the case involves a legal question of sufficient importance to require a final decision of it by the Supreme Court. In the two last-mentioned cases the specific question shall be certified to and finally decided by the Supreme Court. The decision which is made thereon is to be enforced in the same manner as is now provided in a case where a question is certified upon which the judges of a circuit court are divided in opinion. Except in cases touching patent rights and copyrights, the appellate jurisdiction which the Supreme Court now exercises without regard to the sum in controversy will not be divested. If within the year after the judgment on the decree has been rendered the party thereto dies, provision is made to enable a writ of error to be sued out or an appeal to be taken without reviving the judgment or decree in the court where it was rendered.

Some persons are of opinion that the sum of $10,000, the limit fixed in ordinary cases wherein the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court can under this bill be called into exercise, is too small; others regard it as too great.

There must be some restrictions to the right of appeal, and the committee were unanimously of opinion that a less sum should not be prescribed. Every case originating in the district or circuit court may by this bill be reviewed in the court of appeals if $500 is allowed, whereas under existing laws $5,000 is required to give jurisdiction to the Supreme Court. In view of the greatly extended privilege of appeal and the high character of the reviewing court, it seemed to the committee that after two tribunals had passed upon a matter in controversy there should not be a re-examination in a third unless the matter in controversy was of the value of $10,000. It may well be questioned whether the amount, if changed, should not be rather increased than diminished.

The decision of the court of appeals upon a question of fact is final. I regard this as a wise and salutary provision. By the original judiciary act a decree of the circuit court could only be re-examined upon a writ of error. The reviewing power of the Supreme Court was limited to questions of law. Until the act of March 3, 1803, no appeal would lie to that court in a case in equity or of admiralty or maritime jurisdiction. It was then provided that the transcript not only of the pleadings and proceeding but of the depositions should be transmitted to the Supreme Court. Since then the re-examination of the facts as well as of the law of a case devolves on the Supreme Court when an appeal, except from the Court of Claims, is taken. Many of the reported cases on appeal involve chiefly disputed questions of fact. The act of February 16, 1875, confined the review by the Supreme Court of the judgments and decrees on the instance side of courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction to matters of law arising on the record. The facts found by the circuit court are conclusive.

This act has worked beneficially, and by a recent rule of the Supreme Court all depositions and matters of evidence are excluded from the record of such a case. Two subordinate courts having acted upon the facts, Congress wisely provided that nothing should be presented for review but the law arising upon them and such rulings below as were excepted to and embodied in a bill of exceptions. This provision is incorporated in this bill. Where the circuit court and the court of appeals have passed upon the facts, it is obviously unnecessary, to secure the ends of justice and the rights of the parties, that the Supreme Court should be called upon to pass upon more matters of fact. We know that they do not do so on a writ of error when a jury renders a verdict, or the court, by consent of parties, tries the issue and makes a finding. I regard this provision as of great importance and value.

Although the bill is chiefly designed to relieve the Supreme Court, there are some other provisions to which I may refer. A circuit court is established in every district where it does not now exist. When more than one judge competent to hold it is present, each may hold a separate session thereof. The existing law is thus conformed to that which has been enacted in many States where the court consists of several judges, each of whom is competent to hold it. The supreme court of the District of Columbia is thus constituted. In many of our larger cities such a provision is absolutely indispensable to enable the State courts to dispose of pending cases with the requisite dispatch. There is no doubt that the judges of some of the circuit courts are overworked, and, notwithstanding their energetic devotion to duty, cases remain too long on the docket. Justice to litigants requires that there should be additional judicial force in the inferior courts, and this is accomplished by this bill. Every circuit judge and every district judge is empowered also to hold a district court in any district within the circuit whenever he is assigned to that duty by the circuit judge senior in office, and two or more of them may hold separate sessions thereof.

To avoid unnecessary expense the bill provides that the panel of jurors selected and summoned for the district court shall also be the panel for the circuit court, unless a special order be made by one of the judges of the court at least thirty days before the term.

The only objection that I have heard seriously urged in regard to the appellate jurisdiction which the bill confers and limits is that the court of appeals in the different circuits may rule differently upon the same question in cases where less than $10,000 is involved, and that the question cannot be determined by the Supreme Court. It is supposed that confusion and uncertainty would result from such conflicting decisions, and that irreparable mischief may ensue. The same objection, however, is equally applicable to the appellate jurisdiction exercised by the Supreme Court under existing laws where the subject-matter in controversy is of less value than $5,000. The apprehended evil is rather imaginary than real, for in all human probability the same question will arise in some form in other cases of which the Supreme Court has cognizance.

In Illinois, to whose experience in reference to her intermediate courts I have already referred, no such difficulty has occurred. It will also be recollected that this bill specially provides that the Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction of a case when it is certified by the court of appeals that the questions therein involved are of a sufficient importance to require a decision of them by the court of last resort.

The only expense which this bill will entail is the very inconsiderable sum required for the salary of the additional circuit judges. Were it much greater it would be no substantial objection to a measure which will secure such important benefits to the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will state the first amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no doubt the Senate would like to have an opportunity to read and study the able presentation of this bill made by the Senator from Illinois. I, for one, confess that I am not prepared now to proceed properly and intelligently with the discussion of the bill or to act upon the amendments suggested by the committee. I very much prefer that the bill may go over. In consequence of interruptions, which no Senator can avoid in this Chamber, I have not been able to hear the argument of the Senator from Illinois, and I do not feel qualified in every sense to pass a judgment on the bill in all its various features until I have had an opportunity to look over the argument which the Senator has submitted.

I therefore ask the Senate informally to pass by this bill and proceed to the consideration of the Japanese indemnity fund bill. I do not think there will be any objection to that order of business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama that the pending bill be informally laid aside?

Mr. INGALLS. There is objection, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is objected to.

Mr. GARLAND rose.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope the Senator from Arkansas will consent that the Japanese indemity bill be taken up.

Mr. GARLAND. I have not said a word.

Mr. BUTLER. I am aware the Senator has not said a word——

Mr. GARLAND. I should like to say something.

Mr. BUTLER. But I desired simply to anticipate what the Senator was about to say, and to second the request of the Senator from Alabama, for this is a very important bill.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] has objected.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that; but it seems to me, as the Senator from Arkansas has control of the bill——

Mr. GARLAND. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to say that the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama I consider as being entirely reasonable and fair. Although under the vote of the committee I am in charge of the pending bill, yet it is the bill originally in the main introduced by the Senator from Illinois who has just addressed the Senate. His speech explanatory of the bill has been made, and I think it would be well for Senators to have an opportunity to look it over and examine it carefully in connection with the bill. I am perfectly willing for the bill to go over if it does not lose its place to-morrow, and I hope that the Senate to-morrow, when it takes it up again, will stay with it until it is finished and either passed or rejected.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator expect any opposition to the bill?

Mr. GARLAND. I cannot say that I do.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose we take a vote on it now. I think we shall find no difficulty in passing it now.

Mr. GARLAND. I have no objection; but the Senator from Massachusetts will bear in mind that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] stated a little while ago that he was not ready to vote on the bill. I am ready to vote on it.

Mr. MORGAN. I am not willing to vote to-day on the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Arkansas having charge of the bill, it is proper I should make a single remark. In objecting to the request of the Senator from Alabama I did not assume in any way to interfere with the Senator from Arkansas as to the disposition he should make of this bill, but merely wished to show that I am unwilling that the bill shall be informally laid aside with the understanding that the Japanese indemnity bill shall come up. I will state my reason for that. The Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES,] who is very much interested in the Japanese indemnity bill and desires to present to the Senate some reasons why it should not pass, is temporarily absent, but will return in a day or two. He said to me before he departed that he specially desired to be heard upon the bill. I therefore ventured to object, not to the temporary postponement of the court of appeals bill, but to its postponement with the understanding that the Japanese indemnity bill should be now considered. I suggest that we might proceed to the consideration of cases on the Calendar if there is a desire to postpone the court of appeals bill for to-day.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall feel bound to object to that. If I receive no courtesy from the Senate, of course I cannot be expected to extend any.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Alabama is of course not bound to extend courtesy, but in the absence of any business pending before the Senate the Calendar is in order. Therefore it does not require the assent of the Senator from Alabama to consider the Calendar, unless he should object to informally laying aside the court of appeals bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate cannot pass from the consideration of the unfinished business unless by unanimous consent or by postponing the unfinished business. There being no motion to postpone, the Chair will direct the Chief Clerk to report the first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUTLER. I move, then, that the bill be temporarily laid aside. I do not know what I may do when the vote is taken upon the bill; it is quite likely that I shall vote for it; but it is a bill of too much importance, in my judgment, to be passed without the Senate having had an opportunity to examine the argument of the Senator from Illinois made to-day. It is very well understood that we have not been able to hear it, and I want to read his speech in the RECORD to-morrow morning. It is not at all unlikely that after having done so I may make up my mind to vote for the bill. Possibly I may desire to submit some amendments to it. It is a bill of too much consequence, in my judgment, to be rushed through the Senate in this way. Therefore, I move that the bill be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. INGALLS. That cannot be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion would not be in order. The Senator may move to postpone the consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I make that motion.

Mr. INGALLS. In that event the bill loses its place if there be any unfinished business to-day.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from Kansas will withdraw his objection to taking up the Japanese indemnity bill. The Senator from Alabama simply proposes to make a speech I understand.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. INGALLS. If that is the purpose of the Senator from Alabama, I shall certainly withdraw the objection.

Mr. MORGAN. No, I expect to have the bill considered. That is all I desire. I do not care about making a speech because I do not expect to speak five minutes upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina move to postpone the pending bill until to-morrow?

Mr. BUTLER. I do; but not with a view to the bill losing its place on the Calendar. I have no such purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will necessarily lose its place on the Calendar if there should be unfinished business going over from to-day.

Mr. BUTLER. There is no unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there should be at the adjournment.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest, as a method of avoiding the dilemma, that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. SAUNDERS] has a joint resolution upon the Calendar on which he has desired for several days to submit some observations. Why not allow the pending bill to go over informally and take up the joint resolution of the Senator from Nebraska for the purpose of enabling him to submit his remarks? Is there objection to that, Mr. President?

Mr. BUTLER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. COCKRELL and others. There is no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. PLUMB. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is objection. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] to postpone the consideration of the pending bill until to-morrow.

Mr. BUTLER. I withdraw my motion, and move instead that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw my objection if the Senator from Nebraska desires to avail himself of what is ordinarily conceded to be a privilege of a Senator to make remarks, of which he had given notice; but I did desire to object to any expedient of the kind suggested by my colleague to relieve the Senate from the dilemma spoken of, because I had a much better proposition, as I thought, to suggest.

Mr. BUTLER. If the objection is withdrawn, I have no objection to the Senator from Nebraska proceeding.

Mr. INGALLS. I give notice, in pursuance of what I formerly said, that upon the conclusion of the pending bill I shall move the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1382) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas that the bill be informally laid aside for the purpose indicated?

Mr. HOAR. I do not propose to object to the request of the Senator from Nebraska to be heard by the Senate at such time as is convenient to him, but I do propose to object to all other propositions to displace formally or informally the pending business. The Senate will remember that the winter is over and we have now entered on the third month of the spring, the fifth month of the session, and in addition to the most important appropriation bills, which have not yet come to us from the other House, there is a large number of very important public measures which have been matured by the committees of the Senate and are now awaiting action.

It does not seem to be fair to the other interests which those measures affect that a bill having the right of way should take its precedence and then stand as an obstruction to business, not merely for the sake of giving that bill sufficient consideration, but to let in all manner of side matters which are not important enough to obtain the consent of the Senate to give them a place in the business in advance of other measures.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I wish to say that I gave notice about a week ago that on Thursday last I should ask the Senate to allow me to submit some remarks on Senate joint resolution No. 46.

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SAUNDERS. If the objection is withdrawn, I wish to occupy only a few minutes of the time of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the suggestion that the bill be informally laid aside for the purpose of taking up the joint resolution on which the Senator from Nebraska wishes to be heard?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, and others. There is no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection. Before proceeding to the consideration of the joint resolution the Chair will lay before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 176) to refund certain duties paid upon military uniforms imported by and for use of Company G, Sixth Regiment Infantry, Illinois National Guards, and the bill (H. R. No. 4704) for the relief of P. F. Lonergan were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ELECTION OF EXECUTIVE OFFICERS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 46) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I ask that the joint resolution be read.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein,) That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be, and is hereby, proposed to the Legislatures of the several States:

ARTICLE —.

SECTION 1. Congress shall by law provide for the election by the people of postmasters, United States marshals, district attorneys of United States courts, collectors of internal revenue, and other officers whose duties are to be performed within the limits of any State or part of a State, except judges of the Supreme and inferior courts; and all civil officers of the United States except judges of the Supreme and inferior courts, the heads of Departments, and officers whose duties are temporary in their character, shall hold office for a term of four years, unless a longer term shall be fixed by law; but the President shall have the power of removal of any such officer, whether appointed or elected, for any cause affecting the incumbent's character, habits, or other qualifications, excepting political or religious opinions.

SEC. 2. All officers of the United States whose election is provided for in section 1 of this amendment to the Constitution of the United States shall be elected in such manner as the Legislatures of the States shall provide by law.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. President, the subject of civil-service reform has more importance attached to it than, I think, is generally ascribed to it. When the Constitution of the United States was formed and adopted there were only some three millions of people to be governed and cared for, as against fifty millions now. In my opinion, if it could have been foreseen by the framers of the Constitution that the small number of office-holders who received their appointments, either directly or indirectly, from the Administration would so soon have swelled to the number of one hundred thousand, some different plan would have been adopted, and that the President and Cabinet would not have had the work imposed upon them of selecting and appointing so many of them. At the rate at which we as a nation are growing, the work allotted to the President and his Cabinet, even with the aid of Senators and Members of the House, will be so great that they will scarcely be able to attend to settling all the difficulties and dispensing all the patronage, and no time whatever will be left them in which to discharge the real duties of their various offices.

Something, then, should be done to remedy this evil, for it has already become nothing less than an evil, but what that something shall be is the question that requires our careful and candid consideration.

The plan proposed by some Senators of using a board of examiners, which shall be chosen either by the President alone or by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, may answer the purpose of selecting such officers as are required to do the clerical duties of what is called Department work or who are to act as scientific experts, but beyond that it would, in my opinion, prove nothing short of a farce. And even as to clerks in the Departments it seems to me it would be better to allow the heads of the different Cabinet divisions to select the employés and put them on trial for a given time, say thirty or ninety days, or longer, if thought best, with the understanding that they would be dropped out at the end of the time if found incompetent to discharge the duties required of them. Competitive examinations do not always secure the best talent for the work proposed, nor does it give a fair chance to all classes who may wish to compete; for, under examinations as now conducted, or at any rate such as have come under my notice, a great advantage is given to those who are highly educated, or those who may be fresh from the schools and colleges, and this, too, when a thorough scholastic education is not necessary. The farmers and the mechanics who devote their time to manual labor more than to the study of mathematics or other higher branches of education stand a poor chance to compete with the student who has had the advantages of a liberal education. And yet the work to be performed may be such as not to require a knowledge of all the branches of education usually taught in our seminaries and colleges. I have a case in point now in my mind. A person was wanted to examine pension papers or applications for pensions, where common sense and good judgment were the main requisites. Of course a reasonably well educated mind was also necessary to aid in carrying out the work. But what sort of tests were applied to the applicant? One I remember very well. It was that he should answer a question something of this kind: How many feet and inches must be taken from one end of a plank, so many feet and inches long, and so many inches wider at one end than at the other, so as to leave exactly so many square feet in the other end? The applicant was what would be called a good ripe scholar, but not having had occasion for years to refer to his knowledge of numerical scales or duodecimals, he, very naturally I would say, failed to answer the question within the given time, and that and a failure as to a few similar questions actually lost him a chance for employment at which I have every confidence he would have proved himself equal to the best in the country. The questions had nothing more to do with the work which he would be required to perform than would a series of questions upon the number and magnitude of the stars that illuminate the heavens. I do not say that all such nonsense would be indulged in by other boards, but this we do know, all of us, that such examinations seldom give satisfaction to the applicants, while probation for a given time such as I have suggested would do greater justice than the other.

But, Mr. President, the joint resolution which I have submitted applies more directly to the officers who are not required to do the Department work, but whose duties lie in the several States and Territories. Of the eighty-odd thousand office-holders now in the United States more than one-half are postmasters, and these are scattered all over the country, so as to make it almost impossible that they could be reached by a board of commissioners who might, under the bills now pending before this Congress, be required to see that competitive examinations were held. Why cannot the people make their own selections of these officers, and also those connected with the collection of internal revenue? Why should these forty or fifty thousand office-holders—who are daily transacting the business of their offices in their respective towns, cities, and districts—have to be selected by one, two, or even half a dozen men at the national capital? That this course has been pursued since the formation of our Government is no good reason why it should be continued any longer, and the sooner we turn all such business over to the people, from whom all our political power emanates, the better for all concerned. The Constitution was the work of remarkable intelligence and foresight, but it was made when we had some three millions of people as against fifty millions now. Then we had less than one thousand postmasters, while now we have more than forty and six thousand.

Since the year 1800 fifteen amendments have been made to the Constitution, and I believe that not a single line of one of them would be blotted out of that glorious instrument if it were a question to be decided by the people to-day. And now, why may we not add another amendment, and one too which will throw back into the hands of the people a work they are so well qualified to perform? I do not believe in changing the Constitution for light or insufficient cause; but as our country grows and expands, both geographically and in population, further amendments may prove necessary, and when the time comes for such a change—and I believe such an occasion has now come—then I say let us go on with the good work and perfect what was necessarily delivered to us incomplete.

But, Mr. President, on one thing I am settled and fixed, and that is, that among the other reforms loudly called for is the fixing of the time during which officers shall hold their commissions without molestation for anything short of a failure to properly discharge their duties. Whoever is qualified to fill an office and in good faith accepts it and assumes its responsibilities and duties, and who gives up other employments to do so, should have a time fixed by law, a reasonable time, during which he should not be subject to removal for any honest opinions he may entertain, or because he may give his personal support to this or that man for office. I do not hold that any President, or other appointing officer, either in making appointments to newly created offices, or in filling vacancies as they may occur, should be bound to appoint his political enemies, but he should be left free to select from his own political friends. I am aware that in proposing political reforms it is urged by some that no distinction of party should be made in selecting officers, but I do not go thus far. I would not by law require a President to appoint to office under him men whose influence and patronage would be wielded against or in opposition to views and opinions of his which he might regard as essential to the prosperity of the country.

In the earlier days of our Republic, and when we had but comparatively few officers to appoint, it did not so seriously affect the interests and business of the country to change the officers at will as it would now do, when the offices to fill border upon a hundred thousand in number. The work is too much for one man, even if his disposition should lead him to desire to undertake it. Indeed the power in time may become dangerous in the hands of one man. But as this change would require the amendment of the Constitution, which necessarily requires a good deal of time, before any binding law can be passed on the subject, I believe the time has come when affirmative action should be had upon the subject.

As appropriate to this part of the subject I make the following extract from a speech delivered in the Senate some time ago by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] The Senator, while speaking of the great amount of labor which now devolves upon the President in looking after and filling the offices of the Government, says:

> If this vast increase of work, this multiplication of duties intrinsically difficult enough in the beginning were all the difficulties that beset the path of a President, it were still well worth the consideration of all earnest statesmen whether the original plan of vesting the appointing power well-nigh absolutely in the hands of one man did not imperatively demand revision. To all this, however, is added an element of embarrassment and complicated labor not contemplated by those who framed the Government. Political considerations have come to play the most important part in the distribution of this vast patronage. I do not stop to consider the origin of this evil, or to charge it upon one political party more than another. I would deal with the fact confessed by all observers and commended by not a few, that "to the victors belong the spoils;" that with each new administration comes the business of distributing patronage among its friends; it has come to be that the work of readjustment, of paying political debts, and discharging political obligations, of rewarding personal friends and punishing personal foes, is the first to confront each President on assuming the duties of his office, and is ever present with him during his continuance therein, giving him no rest and but little time for the transaction of any other business, or for the study of any higher or grander problems of statesmanship. He is compelled to give daily audience to those who personally seek place or to the army of those who back them. He is to do what some predecessor of his has failed to do, or to undo what others before him have done; to put this man up and that man down as the system of political rewards and punishments shall seem to him to demand. Instead of the study of great questions of statesmanship, of broad and comprehensive administrative policy, either as it may concern this particular country at home, or the relations of this great nation to the other nations of the earth, he must devote himself to the petty business of weighing in the balances the political considerations that shall determine the claim of this friend or that to the possession of some office of profit or honor under him.
> The very office of Chief Magistrate has undergone in practice such a radical change that the President of the Republic created by the Constitution in the beginning and the Chief Magistrate of to-day are two entirely different public functionaries. There has grown up such a perversion of the duties of that high office, such a prostitution of it to ends unworthy the great idea of its creation, imposing burdens so grievous to be borne, and so degrading of all the faculties and functions becoming the ruler of a great people that a change has already come in the character of the Government itself which, if not corrected, will be permanent and disastrous. Thus hampered and beset the Chief Magistrate of this nation wears out his term and his life in the petty services of party, and in the bestowal of the favors its ascendancy commands. He gives daily audience to beggars for place and sits in judgment upon the party claims of contestants.
> The Executive Mansion is besieged, if not sacked, and its corridors and chambers are crowded each day with the ever-changing but never-ending throng. No Chief Magistrate since the evil has grown to its present proportions but has cried out for deliverance. Physical endurance even is taxed beyond its power. More than one President is believed to have lost his life from this cause. The spectacle exhibited of the Chief Magistrate of this great nation, feeding like a keeper his flock, the hungry, clamorous, crowding, jostling multitude which daily gathers around the dispenser of patronage, is humiliating to the patriotic citizen interested alone in national progress and grandeur.
> I arraign no President, and I would say nothing to belittle the great office which represents the character, the power, and the influence of this people among the nations of the earth. I speak only of patent facts, facts which I deplore. In these latter days each President steps into a current, the force of which is constantly increasing. He can neither stem nor control it, much less his own course, as he is buffeted and driven hither and thither by its uncertain and unmanageable forces.
> The necessity of good administration imperatively demands a change. Personal attention to considerations which should control Executive action in the disposition of patronage and in the selection of officials is coming to be an impossibility, and political control, as the guide to such action, is coming to be fraught with demoralization and peril to the Republic. The Executive must be lifted out of this current or be carried away by it.

Again he says:

> The "labor of hearing petitions, examining conflicting pretensions, and distributing offices" as the labor "which never ceases, the exaction of strength and patience which never relaxes its hold, is never satisfied, never tires, never sleeps; which fritters away his powers, and loses in the petty and belittling details of official patronage the grand opportunity for the accomplishment of lasting good by the application to administration of broad and comprehensive statesmanship."

I note also a well written article on this subject in a late number of the Continent, which is from the pen of the editor-in-chief, Judge A. W. Tourgee. He takes no one side on the question, but gives the arguments used for and against such an amendment as is contained in the resolution now under consideration, and in doing so he strengthens, in my opinion, the position taken by the friends of the change. I make the following extract from the article alluded to, which is entitled "Where Two Ways Meet:"

> One of the Senators from Nebraska has introduced a proposition for an amendment of the Federal Constitution so as to allow the subordinate administrative officers of the Government, such as postmasters, district attorneys, marshals, collectors, &c., to be elected by the people of the districts in which they exercise the functions of their respective offices. The Legislature of Minnesota, not long since, instructed its Senators and Representatives to support such a measure, and there is no doubt that a vast majority of the people of all parties would approve such a measure, were it submitted to them. Indeed, there are many thousands of voters who entertain the idea that this is the real significance of what is known as "civil-service reform." A curious illustration of this occurred not long since. Returning from the obsequies of the late President at Cleveland, on a crowded train on the Lake Shore Railroad, a discussion sprang up on the reform of the civil service as a preventive of like evils in the future. After various remarks a prominent citizen of one of the most flourishing towns of the Reserve remarked, emphatically, "Well, gentlemen, I am in favor of civil-service reform. I would like to know why the people of my town are not just as capable of electing a postmaster as a constable." There were many expressions of approval among the passengers, some smiles, and no dissent.

This idea is the very antipode of the underlying principle of the "civil-service reform" movement, and has been sharply assailed by its advocates as a "demagogic" measure, "designed to create a diversion in favor of the spoils system," and so forth. It should be remembered, however, that hard words are not arguments. "Civil-service reform" must win its way into our system of government not by denouncing those who doubt or even those who oppose, but by intrenching itself in the hearts of the masses. It will not do to insist that all the honesty and all the patriotism are upon the side of those who advocate the peculiar system of organizing, appointing, and controlling the civil administration known as "civil-service reform." The real question is not whether the civil service should be made the best that it is possible to have in a republic, but how that end shall be best attained. The whole country is in favor of the betterment of the service, but the tendency toward such betterment has several branches.

This proposed amendment is one of them. As contrasted with the other it is the democratic idea set over against the monarchical system of administration. The former represents the centrifugal, the latter the centripetal tendency of power. The former is the natural outgrowth of the idea that those chosen to represent the people are their agents; the latter is the corollary of the idea that the voter simply makes a choice of rulers. The former is of the type of democracy that springs from the New England town-meeting; the latter is closely allied to that which prevailed at the South before the war of the rebellion, when only a governor and legislature were elected and they appointed all the administrative officers of the State.

The proposed amendment presupposes that the people are capable not only of choosing men who shall direct the administration of affairs, but also those who shall themselves administer them. It seeks safety in multiplying the responsibilities of the people, increasing the number of elective officers, and bringing the administration and control of affairs closer and closer to the voters' hands.

If the President and his Cabinet and Congress could be relieved from this great burden, great curse I might well say, they would all be enabled to give a more satisfactory account of their stewardships. While so much valuable time is taken by the work of dispensing offices it lessens the chances of success in relation to other duties, especially of Congressmen. Mr. President, the hour is coming, and now is, when something should be done to give relief in this matter. Recent events have greatly contributed to arouse the people to the importance of a change. Action should be taken, and that soon, which will in some way bring relief, and I can think of no better way than to remand this work of filling most of the offices back to the people, who can, as I believe, do the work as intelligently, as honestly, as efficiently, and in every respect more satisfactorily than President, Cabinet, or Congress. Some one has said that "that country which is governed least is governed best," and I believe it. An intelligent and educated people are generally as well qualified to select their own officers as is any officer, however high in power and place he may be.

But some one says, "the people would not select as good men as the President and Cabinet would." Why not? Do not the people in many of the States select not only their governors, treasurers, auditors, &c., but also their judges of the courts into whose hands are committed not only the settlement of questions of property but even of life itself? Why should not the people within the delivery of a post-office elect the postmasters; or within a revenue district select the collector; or in a pension district the pension agent; or in a State its marshal or district attorney? Does the Government in its appointments select better men than the people can? If so, why? These elected officers should be made subject to suspension or removal for cause the same as other officers. The President should in my opinion continue to exercise the right to appoint foreign ministers and consuls, the judicial officers and the territorial and departmental officers at the capital. This would be work enough and power enough for one man.

If the course thus indicated were followed the questions before the people would represent less patronage and more principle. Can any man give me a good reason why the people of a State can select its governor but cannot select its land officers? why they cannot select a marshal as well as a sheriff? On a recent public occasion an intelligent gentleman who was at one time a member of the House of Representatives, when alluding to this subject, said:

> This will stop largely the unseemly and corrupting efforts of designing men at the Presidential elections. The questions before the public will be less those of patronage and more of measures and of principles. The temptations to fraud at the ballot-box will be largely removed. The civil service will be purified. The tests of merit, character, respectability, and qualification will be applied by the people, and the places of responsibility will not be filled as mere pay to enterprising and intriguing tricksters for dirty work done to secure the election of the dispenser of patronage.

Whether we look at the public service as well managed, at the elections as purely conducted, or at political results freed from mercenary entanglements, we must conclude that the choice of the people is the best civil-service reform, better than school-book examinations, better than life terms of office, better than corrupt bargaining for places, better than the slimy hand of patronage. What is the curse of public life to-day but patronage? What brought the appalling catastrophe into the White House but patronage? And yet whose fault is it? No one to blame? It is the fault of the Constitution! It is the fault of our stupidity or our negligence in not amending the Constitution and thus rebuilding a better system!

An intelligent editor of a leading newspaper of the West when descanting on the merits of this resolution makes these remarks, and which, by the way, are entirely applicable to the subject:

> When the Constitution was framed the patronage of the Government was insignificant as compared with the present, and therefore the reasons for a different system from the present were not so apparent as now. In making the experiment of self-government there was, likewise, among many a disinclination to trust the people to the fullest extent. Now we know of no valid reasons why all officers, whether county, State, or national, whose duties are local in their scope, should not be elected by the people whom they serve.

Nor do I, Mr. President. The system of civil-service reform which has been proposed and is based upon the idea of competitive examinations and a continuation of the same person in office is anti-republican in principle and would be in practice if carried out. As has well been said, "You cannot test his industry, his faithfulness, or his integrity by asking puzzling questions." All you can do by the mode proposed by those who favor the competitive system is to find out the extent of their knowledge of grammar, rhetoric, mathematics, or kindred subjects. You learn nothing of their manhood, their honesty, or their moral training or habits.

There is another objection to the system proposed by those who hold that officers should be selected by rules laid down in competitive examinations. The law now provides that a preference in the selection for office shall be given to those who were honorably discharged from the military or naval service, and this class under the proposed rules and regulations would be left out unless they could favorably compete with others in the examinations. They might be fully competent to discharge the duties of the office sought, or might closely contend with others in the examinations, but if those who were fresh from the schools should show a little greater familiarity with the science of numbers the prize is lost and the soldier remains out in the cold.

I have no disposition to weaken the power of my Government and would not take from its head one iota of power or patronage that would in any way be necessary to give force and effect to every law or order which is necessary to support the Government and protect the rights of the people. But there is more now in the hands of a President than one man can reasonably and properly attend to, and he should in some way be relieved, and this amendment which I have proposed to the Constitution will at least take down one of the bars that block his way and will place the power for reform where it ought to be—in the hands of those who are the foundation of all political power, the people.

Not only in the political world do we see the concentration of power in one man, but in the financial as well. Only a few years ago and corporations were known to exist only in the larger cities and manufacturing towns. Now you find the bread you eat, or the butter that is designed to make it more palatable, manufactured by machinery and worked by a company, and that controlled, perhaps, by one man. Look at our great railroad corporations. The president or head of one of these institutions is as much of an autocrat, only on a limited scope, as the Emperor of all the Russias. He can say to this man, "Go, and he goeth," and to another, "Come, and he cometh." This like the other is all right if managed right, but either would be a terror in the hands of a bad or designing man.

As I have said before, in the earlier days of our Republic the present system may have worked well, but the machinery was not, in my opinion, adapted to the large numbers of offices that now have to be looked after.

Why, Mr. President, we barely escaped a civil war over the Presidential election in 1876, and who doubts but President Garfield would be with us to-day but for the patronage he held in his hands. A naturally cold-blooded unprincipled wretch, who, being disappointed in office-seeking, lays wait, and deliberately strikes down his victim, because, forsooth, he had been disappointed in his aspirations and anxieties for office. He had been watching and waiting for recognition until he became maddened at his failure, and, with the hope that the wheel might yet be made to turn in his favor, he coolly and deliberately planned the destruction of the President. True such a disaster may never befall the nation again, (and may God forbid that it ever should,) but who can tell, for men not unfrequently become desperate under disappointments, and when one thinks of the thousands who are constantly hanging about the capital asking for similar favors to that sought by this assassin, who can say that any officer is safe who is required to answer to the tens of thousands of applicants who are hanging on to his skirts and crying give, give? Nay, rather let us remove these temptations, and let these hosts of applicants make their appeal to their own countrymen and their own neighbors, and the inducements to strike down the head of the nation will be removed. Had there been an opportunity for such individuals to learn their true standing by applying to the people for office, and had this one failed, as surely he would, he would never have thought of taking revenge on the people. The fact is the life of a President has become, in place of a high, honorable, and dignified office, with honors resting easy upon him, while, as provided by the Constitution, he is seeing that laws are faithfully executed, nothing more than a channel through which favors and charities in the way of offices are dispensed.

The plan of electing Government officers in the States and Territories must, I think, commend itself to every candid and thinking man, because it is just. To deny this is to dispute the virtue, intelligence, and honor of the people. There is policy, wisdom, and justice in the proposed change. Then let us lose no time in bringing it about. While there may be occasionally a mistake made in the selection under present management of employés of the Government—I speak now more particularly of the employés in the various Departments in Washington and in a few of the larger cities—yet this is nothing when compared to the mistakes made in selecting officers who live at a great distance from the capital, where they cannot be seen or conversed with. I apprehend, Mr. President, if those outside officers were selected and disposed of by the people, that the other portion could be arranged without any trouble. In other words, it is not the clerkships in Washington City that give the great trouble to the Executive. Then let us provide for the election of the list of officers named in this proposed amendment to the Constitution, and no great trouble nor inconvenience will be experienced in taking care of the other employés of the Government.

Mr. President, I now move to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, and hope that it may receive their careful consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before putting the question the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

The ACTING SECRETARY. "A bill (S. No. 420) to establish a court of appeals."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After sixteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and sixteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 1, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

MAIL CONTRACTORS IN OVERFLOWED DISTRICTS.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask unanimous consent to introduce at this time for consideration a joint resolution for the relief of mail contractors in the overflowed districts.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion and upon a proper showing made, relieve mail contractors and sub-contractors in the sections recently or at present overflowed by the Mississippi River and its tributaries from forfeitures or deductions from pay incurred by reason of failure to perform service according to contract, where such failure was occasioned by overflow or extreme high water, and the contractors or carriers themselves were not at fault.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like some explanation of this resolution.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask the indulgence of the House one moment for an explanation.

Mr. HOLMAN. Reserving the right to object.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, in the overflowed districts it has been impossible for the mail contractors and sub-contractors to perform the service that they had contracted to render. This inability has been occasioned by the roads over which they ordinarily travel being overflowed. The contractors have been at all times ready to perform the service they had engaged to perform. A large number of applications have come from the overflowed districts asking the Postmaster-General to relieve contractors and sub-contractors from the consequences of not being able to comply with their contracts. They state it is not their fault that this service has not been performed; that while they were at all times ready to perform it, it was a physical impossibility for them to do so. They therefore have asked the Postmaster-General to relieve them from the consequence of nonperformance of this service. This consequence would be a deduction from their pay. The Postmaster-General, I have been informed, was willing to grant this request in proper cases, but upon referring the matter to the Attorney-General was informed that the Postmaster-General had no discretion in regard to this matter, and that the deductions or forfeitures must be made. This joint resolution is to the effect that the Postmaster-General may in his discretion and upon proper showing relieve these contractors or sub-contractors from the consequences of their failure to perform the service under the circumstances.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that relief ought to be granted in a case of this kind; but there certainly must be some provision of law under which such relief can be given, inasmuch as embarrassments of this kind in the delivery of the mails must frequently occur.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will state to the gentleman that the existing statute is in about this language: That the Postmaster-General "may," in case of failure of contractors or sub-contractors to perform service, make deductions or forfeitures of their pay. The Postmaster-General construing the law, thought, as I am informed, that he had discretion to grant relief in these cases; but upon referring the matter to the Attorney-General that officer, as I am informed, construed the word "may" as having the effect of "must" or "shall;" and he advised the Postmaster-General that under the law as it stands he has no discretion in the matter. Hence the necessity for this resolution proposing to give the Postmaster-General the necessary discretion.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then, as I understand the gentleman, it is now imperative on the Postmaster-General to make the deduction and to enforce the penalty.

Mr. HASKELL. No, sir; the contractors must either carry the mails according to their contracts or lose their pay.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I think I can explain this matter. Between the mouth of the Ohio River and the city of New Orleans the great trunk mail-route is the Mississippi River. The mails are landed at post-offices on either bank of the river and from there distributed into the country, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, or seventy-five miles by land routes, on which the service can be performed on horse-back or by stage at comparatively small expense. But these routes being now overflowed, the contractors are compelled to carry the mails by steamboats, skiffs, or other modes of water conveyance, at a much greater expense than the ordinary modes of transportation. I have received letters and petitions from these contractors in my section of the country stating that it is utterly impossible for them in many cases to obtain water transportation for the mail service which in ordinary times is performed by stage or on horse-back. This is the difficulty.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire what is the present state of the law?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Under the present law these contractors cannot be relieved under circumstances like the present. The law, I understand, does not provide for such a case as this.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, difficulties of this kind must be occurring all the time.

Mr. ELLIS. The present law authorizes the Department to impose a fine upon the contractors for non-performance of their contracts.

Mr. ROBERTSON. A fine of $250 for each failure.

Mr. HOLMAN. And to remit the fine.

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, if good cause be assigned.

Mr. HASKELL. But the pay of the contractor is on the number of trips, and no matter what obstacles may be in the way, if he does not perform the trips he does not get his pay; and in addition to the forfeiture of pay he is liable under the present law to a fine——

Mr. HOLMAN. Which may be remitted.

Mr. HASKELL. Which may be partially or wholly remitted, but the contractors cannot get their pay unless they perform their trips according to the contract.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, does my friend believe it right to pay these contractors for work they do not perform? I think there ought to be some time taken for the consideration of this resolution.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I hope the gentleman will not object. I ask that the joint resolution be again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. On a subject of this kind we should not legislate too hastily. It seems to me these men should not be paid for work they do not perform.

Mr. BLANCHARD. For work they are unable to perform. They have their stock on hand and are at the expense of keeping that stock, though it is a physical impossibility to render the service. I ask the gentleman from Indiana not to object.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the joint resolution be read again.

The Clerk again read the joint resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the power now exists to remit penalties imposed under the law the question is whether it is proper for us, by the passage of this joint resolution, to pay contractors during the time they were unable to perform their contracts. I think we should take more time to consider the subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana objects.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Let it go to some committee with leave to report back at any time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Inasmuch as this seems to be a measure which should be considered, let it go to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads with leave to report at any time.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I assent to that.

There was no objection, and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 201) for the relief of certain mail contractors in the overflowed districts was received, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, with leave to report at any time, and ordered to be printed.

J. J. MURPHY.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I move by unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 1388) for the relief of J. J. Murphy be taken from the Speaker's table and put on its passage at this time.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the bill be read subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to ascertain the amount remaining in the Treasury of the moneys received from the sale for direct taxes of the real estate of J. J. Murphy, of Memphis, Tennessee, in 1864, and, after deducting from said sum the amount of said tax and all penalties and all costs and expenses incurred by the United States in collecting the same, to pay over the balance, not exceeding the sum of $1,858.80, to the owner of said estate at the time of the seizure of said property, or his legal representative.

Mr. RANDALL. We still reserve the right to object until some explanation has been made.

Mr. MOORE. The report of the committee accompanying the bill is not long and will take not more than half a minute to read it.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1388) for the relief of J. J. Murphy, have considered the same, and respectfully report:

That it appears that in 1864, certain lands lying in Shelby County, Tennessee, belonging to Mr. Murphy, were sold for non-payment of United States taxes. It is alleged that the property sold for an amount more than sufficient to fully indemnify the United States for taxes, penalties, and costs. This surplus is sought to be recovered by this bill.

The committee report back the bill, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and recommend that it pass.

Mr. COX, of New York. There are other cases of a like character and there should be passed a general law covering them all.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. That is a meritorious matter, and I hope no one will object to it.

Mr. BRAGG. My objection is that the bill does not provide a quit-claim to the Government or any guarantee of title. That is the only objection I make to it.

CALL OF STATES.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, this being Monday the first business in order is the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees. EXTENDING NATIONAL-BANK CHARTERS.

The SPEAKER. The call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference is now concluded.

Mr. CRAPO. I move to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. No. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence be taken from the House Calendar and made the special order for the 9th day of May instant after the morning hour, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, not to interfere with the consideration of general appropriation and revenue bills; said bill to be considered by the House as in Committee of the Whole, shall be open to amendment, including committee amendments and an amendment restricting the deposit of lawful money and withdrawal of bonds at pleasure; also an amendment in reference to the jurisdiction of State courts where a bank is situated in the trial of suits with citizens of that locality; also in reference to loans upon real-estate security; and such other amendments and restrictions as may be germane to the bill, or entire substitutes therefor.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

The motion was seconded.

Mr. CRAPO. I did not anticipate, Mr. Speaker, that there would be any discussion this morning upon this resolution. I had supposed an understanding had been reached that the resolution would be adopted, as it embraces distinctly a proposition for the submission to the House of the various amendments which have been suggested by gentlemen who are opposed to the bill.

Mr. HATCH. Will the gentleman state with whom any arrangement has been made?

Mr. CRAPO. There has been no arrangement with any particular person; but there has been a general understanding that if certain specific amendments should be submitted to a vote the House would be disposed to consider the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. When and where and with whom was that understanding arrived at? It was not in this Hall. It does not appear in the RECORD.

Mr. BERRY. Does this resolution permit the bill to be subject to any amendments that may be offered?

Mr. CRAPO. Yes; the resolution is very broad.

Mr. BERRY. I understand the bill to be open only to the specific amendments named.

Mr. CRAPO. And others.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman vote to put the amendments on the bill?

Mr. CRAPO. I think, Mr. Speaker, that if the last clause of the resolution be again read members will see it is broad enough to cover the introduction of all amendments.

Mr. MILLS. I want to know whether the Committee on Banking and Currency or the gentleman from Massachusetts has any parliamentary right, to the exclusion of all other business, to bring this matter before the House every Monday?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MILLS. I thought it was.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I call for the reading of the resolution.

Mr. MILLS. I demand a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. A second has been ordered. The resolution will be again read.

The Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to learn from the gentleman from Massachusetts whether he wishes to occupy his fifteen minutes now or after some time has been consumed on this side.

Mr. CRAPO. I was not disposed to occupy the time of the House at all. It seemed to me that the House thoroughly understood the question. I would not present this resolution on consecutive Mondays if I did not feel the urgency of the question, and that the business of the country requires the consideration of this bill. If those who are opposed to the resolution desire to be heard, I will reserve my time to reply.

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER,] a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Speaker, I feel it due to the position I occupy as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency that I should say something in reference to this resolution. Twice it has been before the House, and on both occasions the House has refused to suspend the rules for its consideration. I have in accordance with my pledge to the committee, and out of courtesy to the majority of the committee, declined to take any part either in the discussion or in the vote on the question. But it seems now due to myself that I should explain the position I occupy with reference to this bill.

I do not hesitate to say that the bill is unnecessary for any public purpose, from the fact that the Comptroller of the Currency is to-day, and has been for some time past, authorizing in effect a continuation of the charters of these banks as the time arrives when they would go out of existence. I do not doubt, nor does the Comptroller of the Currency, his power in this regard.

I believe, sir, that this bill if passed will turn out to be a delusion and a cheat. The difficulty with the national banks is not that their charters are expiring, but it grows out of the fact that the debt upon which their circulation is based is bound to be paid at the rate of $100,000,000 a year for the next four years at least; for I assume as beyond all controversy that the surplus revenues of the Treasury, notwithstanding any diminution that may be made by any bill that we may pass at this session, will amount to at least $100,000,000 a year. Nothing will be done next Congress for the reason that it is the year of the Presidential election. We have, then, this fact staring us in the face, and it is a fact to which I desire to call the attention of Congress and the country, that this bill if passed in any form will not ward off the danger before the country. Already the banks have decreased their circulation in the neighborhood of $1,000,000 since the 1st of January last, owing to the fact that the 3½ per cent. bonds held by the banks are being called in. Five hundred million dollars of these bonds are now subject to the call of the Government; and one-half or nearly one-half of these bonds are 3½ percents, and only $124,000,000 or $125,000,000 of all other bonds are held by the banks as security for their circulation.

If these bonds are paid, as they will be, one hundred millions this year, and one hundred millions next year, what effect will these two hundred millions of bonds have upon the condition of the currency within the next three or four years? I say that the duty of this Congress to the country, and even to the banks, is, if possible, to find some constituent in place of the foundation being undermined by this determination of the people to pay these 3½ percents in this time. That is what they need, and not this legislation, or anything like it; for, sir, it will delude the people into the idea that everything is going on smoothly when there is danger and great danger ahead of us from the rapid contraction which will necessarily follow from the payment of this portion of the public debt.

Mr. CRAPO. Let me ask the gentleman a question. But suppose you abolish the national banks, how will it remedy the difficulties you are now dwelling on?

Mr. BUCKNER. I do not propose to abolish the banks.

Mr. CRAPO. Suppose you fail to consider this national banking bill, for the extension of the national banks, how will it remedy the difficulties of which you are speaking?

Mr. BUCKNER. There is no way of remedying it except by Congress authorizing some other circulation to be adopted.

Mr. CRAPO. If we fail to consider this national banking bill do you not aggravate the difficulties upon which you are dwelling?

Mr. BUCKNER. Not at all. In my judgment, there is one provision in this bill it would be well to adopt, and that is where the bank fails to reorganize that it may continue its existence for other purposes, by putting it into the hands of a receiver. Beyond that I say it will delude the people into the idea that the business of this country is safe and secure for the next six or eight years, and that Congress has given this as a remedy, when in point of fact it is nothing more than a delusion and fraud upon the people.

My friend asks how is this? I have already attempted to explain it. The difficulty is not from any failure of recharter of these banks, not in their going out of existence, but because the foundation has been taken out from under them by the rapid payment of the public debt. You will see this in the late call for eleven or twelve millions of 3½ per cent. bonds. There you will see really the whole difficulty in this matter, for half of that amount must come from the national banks. They will not buy a 4 or a 4½ per cent. bond at the present rates of premium. They can only buy 3½ percents at anything like par, and they are liable to be called for redemption at any time. As the 3½ percents are redeemed, the banks holding them will give up their circulation rather than pay the market rates for either the 4 or 4½ percents. The recharter of the banks cannot obviate this difficulty under which the banks labor.

Mr. Speaker, this is a grave question. It presents a difficulty as to our currency, which must be most obvious to the most ordinary perception. It is absolutely necessary for the future of our paper circulation that something should be done in the way of relief during this Congress. My apprehensions and fears of the future may be without foundation, but we have time enough, if they are groundless, at the next session of Congress, to take such action as may be found necessary and proper. Eighty-eight national banks will go out of existence between now and the 1st of next December. Let us wait and see what will be the action of this bank and the effect of their action on the circulation, because all the banks that really desire to do so can be reorganized under the law as it now stands by the Comptroller.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUCKNER. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. Would not a reduction of the revenues of the Government to such an extent as to check the unwholesome rapidity with which our bonds are being called in leave a basis for the banks?

Mr. BUCKNER. Unquestionably it would. But my friend from Pennsylvania will recollect, as it has been expressed by the House, that there is no more universal sentiment existing in this country than the determination of the people of the United States to pay off the national debt, without reference to the banks or anything else, as rapidly as the condition of the country will permit. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLEY. Can they pay the debt beyond the four hundred and ninety millions of extended bonds except by buying the fours and four-and-a-halfs at whatever premium may be demanded for them.

Mr. BUCKNER. Of course they cannot, beyond the $500,000,000 of 3½ percents we have now subject to redemption.

Mr. KELLEY. There are $750,000,000 that may be paid in the next twenty-five years at par, and why not reduce our revenues to a point that would bring about a more gradual absorption of outstanding bonds?

Mr. BUCKNER. My friend will recollect there are $250,000,000 which can be paid in 1891. I undertake to say no bill you can pass here is going to affect it. You only ask for the consideration of a bill which will affect the smaller taxes, say to the extent of ten or fifteen million dollars. The reports from the Treasury show that if we were to take off the match tax and the taxes on bank capital and on bank deposits and all other internal taxes except on whisky and tobacco, the reduction would not be equal to more than the difference of our interest account a year ago and what it is now. Necessarily, unless the gentlemen will reduce the taxes—and there is no probability of that at this or the next Congress—we will pay off these bonds that constitute the main support and foundation of the present United States national-bank circulation within the next three or four years.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will reserve the remainder of my time, or I will yield it to the gentleman from Missouri if he desires it.

Mr. ROBESON. Let me ask a question in the gentleman's time.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have yielded it to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BUCKNER. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. ROBESON. Let me ask a question.

Mr. HOOKER. Do not be so impatient, gentlemen on the other side of this House.

Mr. ROBESON. I do not wish to take up much time, but merely to ask a practical question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield his time to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman.

Mr. BUCKNER. I am very much obliged to the gentleman and shall detain the House but a moment. I only want to call the attention of the House in emphasis of the few remarks which I have made and the opinion I have expressed to the fact that there is no necessity for this bill at this time. I am not able to speak accurately as to the amount of national-bank circulation now in existence. But that has nothing to do with the question, nor is it necessary that we should give it consideration in connection with the pending proposition. That has nothing to do with it.

But in support of the facts which I have cited, I wish to call attention to an article which I find in a Philadelphia paper, showing that within the last two or three weeks two of these banks at all events have given up their circulation because the bonds were called in and they did not want to go into the market to replace them. I find this article in a recent issue of a Philadelphia paper showing that within the last two or three weeks two banks in that city have given up their circulation and retired their maturing bonds for the reason that the bonds had matured, and as they had no others to replace them they determined to settle that much of their circulation; and this withdrawal had no perceptible effect on trade, although some four hundred thousand dollars were thus withdrawn. The article to which I refer is as follows:

> A short time since the Philadelphia National Bank withdrew $400,000 of its circulation. The reason for this, as explained by President Comegys, was that bonds to the amount named had matured, and as they had no others to replace them with it was determined to settle that much of the circulation. Mr. Comegys said this step and the entire cancellation of circulation by some other banks, notably the Western National, did not show that trade was in any way affected.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Comegys is not connected with the Western Bank.

Mr. BUCKNER. No, sir. This article goes on to say:

> The concerns prefer to do a general banking business, and hold that their circulation is no material benefit to them. The retirement of the legal-tenders does not affect the volume of currency to any appreciable extent, because of the large production of gold and silver, so no apprehension need be felt in any quarter.

Now, that this proposition is in the interest of the national banks I do not doubt. It will save them from trouble and expense—certainly expense—as to the printing of their notes and making deposits necessary to take up their circulation. But I want to know of this House what interest the people have in this matter and what effect it will have upon them; and that is the only ground upon which Congress can legitimately grant the extension of these charters.

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a single question just here?

Mr. BUCKNER. Yes, sir; I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. ROBESON. I wish to ask the gentleman if three hundred and ninety national banks go into liquidation between now and the last of next February——

Mr. MORRISON. They do not want to go into liquidation.

Mr. ROBESON. I am not speaking to the gentleman now.

If these banks go into liquidation will they not necessarily call upon every man who owes them to pay up?

Mr. BUCKNER. Not necessarily; not at all.

Mr. ROBESON. And will not these men who are called upon to pay up call upon every man who owes them to pay up?

Mr. BUCKNER. Not at all.

Mr. ROBESON. And will they not, these latter men, call upon every other man that owes a man that owes them to pay up?

Mr. BUCKNER. No, sir; not necessarily.

Mr. ROBESON. And will not that create a panic?

Mr. MORRISON. There is no panic except in the mind of the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. ROBESON. And does not that destroy the value of every man's property?

Mr. BUCKNER. No, sir. It does not affect the currency at all, because it is published to-day in the records and correspondence with the Comptroller of the Currency as to the national banks, in which he says that he has the power to prescribe the forms and rules by which the banks can be reorganized; and that every bank that desired it has been reorganized practically by the Comptroller of the Currency; and if they can reorganize under the powers now conferred by law on the Comptroller, there is no real necessity for the passage of this law, and the failure to pass this bill will produce no such results as the question of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] presupposes.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CRAPO. I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HUTCHINS.]

Mr. HUTCHINS. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri in relation to the necessity for some action being taken by this Congress in reference to the currency of the country. What he says is perfectly true. About two hundred and forty millions of what are called 3½ per cent. bonds, being the substituted bonds for the old 5 and 6 per cent. extended bonds, are being paid off, being bonds which are now used as a basis for the national banking currency. What is to take the place of that currency when these bonds are paid off has not as yet been decided upon by Congress. But, Mr. Speaker, that is not the question before the House. Let us for the time being cast aside prejudices and for one moment consider what is the real question which is confronting us. It is simply this, the consideration of a bill which has been reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency providing the mode of renewal of the charters of national banks which are now about expiring.

It will be remarked that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] and the other gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] do not propose to give up the national banking system, but it is only that they desire to have a change from the national banking currency to the treasury notes of the Government. That question, however, should stand by itself, and we ought to reserve our opinion as to the best mode of reaching a desirable solution of it, for the present considering one thing at a time. My friend from Missouri says it is unnecessary to take action now. I want to say to him that in my opinion the action taken by the House heretofore renders it necessary that we should take action, and favorable action, without delay.

As every gentleman knows who has ever had anything to do with banking and currency, there is nothing so timid as capital. The business men of the country do not understand the situation of this matter; but there is an impression among them in the State of Missouri, as well as in the State of New York, that there is something wrong, and unless action is taken to provide for the extension of bank charters about expiring there will be trouble in the money market. And therefore the wheels of finance are being stopped. There is no doubt about it. Men to my knowledge who had intended to erect buildings have countermanded the order, awaiting the action of this House. Men who were intending to go into operations that called for the expenditure of large sums of money have countermanded the order, waiting to see the action of this House, and there is not a gentleman here who, if he were called upon to enter into a new enterprise involving the expenditure of a large sum of money, not even my friend from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER,] but would refuse to enter into it till this question was settled.

Let us fix the time for discussion—I wish we could do it unanimously—and then let us debate this question as it should be debated, and understand it; and I am sure this Congress has the ability, the sense, and the patriotism to arrive at last at a conclusion that will bring continued peace and prosperity to our whole country. [Applause.]

Mr. DUNN. Why not have a commission on it?

Mr. CRAPO. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HARDENBERGH.]

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I am gratified that at last this question is before the American Congress. By mutual understanding it seems to be considered that it shall be open, before the passage of the bill, when a day is named, to any amendment that may be offered.

We are not responsible in this Congress for the existence of the national banking act. It was no creation of ours; but we find it here in existence. And I must say that in the arguments that have been made upon this question we seem to have lost sight of its whole marrow and its whole pith. If this were a question to-day before the House as to whether the national banking system should be created anew or not, then some of us might understand how to vote. But the national banking system goes on, because your banks can reorganize in a very day, and perpetuate their existence for twenty years. Therefore, by no discussion that you give to this bill, nor by any action of yours do you restrict its provisions or prevent the operations of the system throughout the country.

What, then, is the question before us? What is the difference between the two methods—the reorganization and the extension of the charters? As I remarked in the House the other day, and showed by tabular statements, between now and the 25th of next February three hundred and ninety-one bank charters will expire. The question is whether those banks shall liquidate or whether their existence shall be continued by your action upon this bill. If you force them to liquidate, you produce a contraction of over sixty millions of money that must be called away from the industrial interests of the country, and that just as we are going on conquering and to conquer in all our industrial pursuits.

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I did not interfere with the gentleman from Missouri while he was speaking, and ask him to let me proceed without interruption.

Just as we are trying to aid the industries of our country in every way in our power, up comes this question before us demanding a solution. I desire the attention of the House to this fact: that if the banks must liquidate and their charters are not extended you produce between now and next year a forced contraction of over sixty millions of public credit.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman explain in what manner that forced contraction will be produced?

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Yes; I will explain it. I will do so from my own personal stand-point, so that the gentleman can understand it. The bank of which I am president has a capital of $250,000, a surplus of $225,000, loans out to the extent of $1,000,000 on call and on time. Now, if you refuse to-day, or before this Congress adjourns, to say the charter of that bank shall be extended it must immediately contract to recover the $225,000 of surplus to pay the stockholders. They have got to do it.

Mr. SPRINGER. When you have paid this money to the stockholders will it not still be in circulation?

Mr. HARDENBERGH. No; because it will be scattered over a dozen different States.

Mr. SPRINGER. But it will be still in the country.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. While I have been a member of this House I have never stood up here for a single monopoly. I have never voted away one acre of the public lands, and I would allow my right arm to forget its cunning before I would vote for any monopoly. Let me tell you how I would seek to protect the people to-day. We have one hundred and thirty different stockholders in my bank scattered throughout the State of New Jersey and other States. You force my bank into liquidation. Any five men can come forward and write their names for $50,000 each, and you have as perfect a monopoly as ever existed.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Certainly.

Mr. MILLS. Will your bank have to go into liquidation unless this bill is passed?

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Certainly it will.

Mr. MILLS. Then I make the point of order that the gentleman cannot vote on this bill.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I have this to say to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS:] my relations with him have always been very pleasant; but if he thinks that the ownership of a thousand dollars of stock in the bank in which I happen to be president will control my action here he little understands me or the constituency I represent.

The SPEAKER. The time for debate has expired.

Mr. CRAPO. I now call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CRAPO] to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which has been read.

Mr. MILLS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MILLS. Before the roll is called, I make the point of order that the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. HARDENBERGH,] having stated that he was interested as an officer of one of the banks whose charter will expire unless this bill is passed, he cannot vote on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must decide that question for himself.

Mr. MILLS. Under the rules of the House he cannot vote where he is directly interested in the question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must decide for himself upon the question of his interest; the Speaker cannot decide that question.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 150, nays 65, not voting 76; as follows:

YEAS—150.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, with Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. LADD. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made to dispensing with the reading of the names, the Clerk will now read the names of those voting.

The Clerk read the names, after which the result was announced as above stated.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. As some gentlemen who desired to speak upon this resolution in regard to the national-bank bills have not had the opportunity, I move that leave be granted to members to print remarks on the subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HARDENBERGH] asks that leave be granted to such members as desire to print in the RECORD remarks on the resolution just adopted.

Objection was made.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move that the rules be suspended and that the joint resolution which I send to the desk be passed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution for the abrogation of all stipulations in existing treaties with China which permit the immigration of Chinese into the United States except for travel, education, and foreign commerce.

Whereas the great majority of Chinese who immigrate to this country are detrimental to the welfare of American laborers; and

Whereas they manifest no willingness or capacity or intention to assimilate with our own people and have no appreciation of our institutions; and

Whereas the execution of the fifth and sixth articles of the treaty generally known as the Burlingame treaty endangers the peace and good understanding existing between the United States and China, and interferes with the power of Congress to regulate foreign commerce: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to immediately open correspondence with the Government of China for the purpose of securing a change or abrogation of all stipulations in existing treaties which permit the immigration of Chinese into the United States, except for travel, education, and foreign commerce.

Mr. KASSON. What power to abrogate have we under the treaty?

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to offer an amendment to this resolution.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I do not yield for the purpose of allowing the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. TOWNSHEND.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire that the House may consider the motion as seconded.

The SPEAKER. No second has been demanded.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Let the question be taken on seconding the motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, and Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 100.

So the House refused to second the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask for the yeas and nays upon this proposition.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Although the rules provide that the roll need not be called on seconding a motion of this kind, I make the point that this is a motion to suspend the rules, including that rule as well as all others.

The SPEAKER. But the motion is not entertained by the House.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. The rules are not yet suspended.

Mr. REED. You cannot suspend the rules until you suspend them. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The vote just taken was to determine whether this proposition should be entertained by the House; and the House has refused to entertain it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. My purpose was to show that but one Republican in this House has voted to sustain the motion.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. The gentleman is not in order. I know he does not wish to make a speech out of order.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN IOWA.

Mr. McCOID. I move to suspend the rules so as to take from the House Calender and pass the bill (H. R. No. 4166) to divide the State of Iowa into two judicial districts.

The bill was read, as follows.

Be it enacted, &c., That the State of Iowa be, and the same is hereby, divided into two judicial districts, in manner following, to wit: The counties of Clinton, Jones, Linn, Benton, Black Hawk, Grundy, Hardin, Hamilton, Webster, Calhoun, Sac, Ida, Monona, and all the counties north of those named shall constitute a new district, to be known as the northern district of Iowa. The remaining counties of the State shall constitute the southern district of Iowa; and the present district court of Iowa, from and after the passage of this act, shall be known as the district court for the southern district of Iowa.

SEC. 2. That the present judge of the district of Iowa is hereby declared to be the district judge for the southern district of Iowa; and the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized and directed, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint a district judge for the northern district of Iowa.

SEC. 3. That the district attorney and United States marshal for the district of Iowa shall be the district attorney and marshal of the southern district of Iowa; and the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is authorized and directed to appoint one person as marshal and one as district attorney for the northern district of Iowa.

SEC. 4. That there shall be appointed by the judge of the northern district of Iowa, with the approval of the circuit judge of the eighth judicial circuit, a clerk for the district and circuit courts in and for said northern district of Iowa. The persons now acting as clerks for the district of Iowa shall be the clerks for the southern district of Iowa.

SEC. 5. That for the purpose of holding terms of court the northern district shall be divided into four divisions, to be known as the eastern, southern, central, and western divisions. The counties of Clinton, Jackson, Jones, Linn, Benton, and Black Hawk shall constitute the southern division, the courts for which shall be held at the city of Cedar Rapids. The counties of Buchanan, Delaware, Dubuque, Clayton, Fayette, Bremer, Floyd, Chickasaw, Mitchell, Howard, Winneshiek, and Allamakee shall constitute the eastern division, the courts for which shall be held at the city of Dubuque. The counties of Grundy, Hardin, Hamilton, Webster, Calhoun, Pocahontas, Palo Alto, Emmett, Kossuth, Humboldt, Wright, Hancock, Winnebago, Worth, Cerro Gordo, Franklin, and Butler shall constitute the central division, the courts for which shall be held at Fort Dodge. The counties of Monona, Woodbury, Plymouth, Sioux, Lyon, Osceola, O'Brien, Cherokee, Ida, Sac, Buena Vista, Clay, and Dickinson shall constitute the western division, the courts for which shall be held at Sioux City.

SEC. 6. That for the purpose of holding terms of court the southern district of Iowa shall be divided into four divisions, to be known as the Davenport, eastern, central, and western divisions. The counties of Scott, Cedar, Muscatine, Washington, and Louisa shall constitute the Davenport division, in which the courts shall be held at the city of Davenport. The counties of Keokuk, Mahaska, Monroe, Appanoose, Davis, Wapello, Jefferson, Van Buren, Henry, Des Moines, and Lee shall constitute the eastern division, in which the courts shall be held at the city of Keokuk. The counties of Johnson, Iowa, Poweshiek, Jasper, Tama, Marshall, Story, Boone, Greene, Dallas, Polk, Madison, Warren, Marion, Clarke, Lucas, Decatur, and Wayne, shall constitute the central division, in which the courts shall be held at the city of Des Moines. The counties of Guthrie, Carroll, Crawford, Harrison, Shelby, Audubon, Adair, Cass, Pottawattamie, Mills, Montgomery, Adams, Union, Ringgold, Taylor, Page, and Fremont shall constitute the western division, in which the courts shall be held at the city of Council Bluffs: Provided, That the additional courts at the places in the several divisions provided by this act shall be held in buildings provided for that purpose without expense to the United States.

SEC. 7. That there shall be held in each of the several divisions of the northern and southern districts herein created two terms of the district and circuit courts in each and every year, the times of holding said terms to be fixed by the judge of the district, upon consultation and agreement with the judge of the eighth judicial circuit.

SEC. 8. That the circuit judge of the eighth judicial circuit may, by order, direct the judges of the said northern and southern districts of Iowa to sit together in holding the circuit court in either of said districts; and when so sitting the judge oldest in commission shall preside, and in case of disagreement between them his opinion shall prevail for the time being: Provided, however, That a certificate of division may be signed by them with like effect as in cases provided by law for certificates of division between a circuit and district judge.

SEC. 9. That all civil suits not of a local nature must be brought in the division of the northern or southern district where the defendant or defendants reside; but if there are two or more defendants residing in different divisions the action may be brought in either of the divisions in which a defendant resides. When the defendant is a non-resident of either district, action may be brought in any division of either district wherein the defendant may be found. Causes removed from any of the courts of the State of Iowa to the circuit court of the United States shall be removed to the circuit court in the division in which said State court is held.

SEC. 10. That all causes now pending in the courts held in the respective divisions of the State of Iowa shall be continued in the corresponding divisions of the northern or southern districts with the same force and effect as though originally commenced therein.

SEC. 11. That cases taken by appeal or writ of error from any of the sessions of the district court in the northern district shall go to the circuit court held at Dubuque, and in the southern district cases taken by appeal or writ of error from any of the sessions of the district court in the southern district shall go to the circuit court held at Des Moines.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, demanded a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

By unanimous consent the motion was seconded.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to give my reasons against the passage of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCOID] is recognized as controlling the time for debate in favor of the motion, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] the time against it.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to hear the reasons why this bill should be passed.

Mr. McCOID. All I will say at present is that the bill has been unanimously recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary. It divides the State of Iowa into two judicial districts, and is a matter of absolute necessity, as shown by the report. Until I hear what gentlemen have to say in opposition to the bill, I will not occupy further time in favor of it.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to oppose this bill; I expect to vote for it. But I wish to call the attention of the Judiciary Committee in particular to the fact that one of the first bills introduced at this session and referred to that committee was a bill introduced by myself, proposing to divide the northern district of the State of Alabama into two divisions, and to establish a court at Birmingham, in the southern division. That bill has lingered in the committee; it has not yet been reported. At present people in my State are obliged to travel, in some cases, two hundred and fifty or three hundred miles to attend court at Huntsville.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask whether the gentleman rises to oppose this bill? If not, I want time to oppose it myself. I understand he is not opposing it.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I have the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire that time be reserved to be occupied in opposition to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama demanded a second; and the Chair understood that he desired to oppose the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understood him to say that he was in favor of the bill and was going to vote for it.

The SPEAKER. Those who are opposed to a bill ought to have fifteen minutes of the time allowed for debate.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to claim that time now, before there is any misunderstanding about it; for I am opposed to the bill and want to state my reasons. It is not fair that those who favor a bill should occupy the time allotted under the rule to those who oppose it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman should appeal to the gentleman from Alabama for time.

Mr. SPRINGER. I appeal to the House and to the Chair. I cannot control the floor. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I hope the gentleman will hear me through. I have a right to oppose this bill in my own way.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is the gentleman in favor of the passage of the bill?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I will answer that question before I get through.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is obliged to rely upon the good faith of members in this matter, and cannot undertake to indicate how they shall oppose a measure or what they shall say.

Mr. SPRINGER rose.

Mr. McLANE. I rise to a question of order. I call the gentleman from Illinois to order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am upon the floor to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is not entitled to recognition.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am up on a question of order. It is this, that I or some gentleman opposed to the bill is entitled to fifteen minutes allowed under the rule for debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair agrees with the gentleman from Illinois that those opposed to a measure are entitled to the time in opposition, and the Chair has recognized the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] as opposed to the pending bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman speaks in favor of the bill, I want to know whether some gentleman is not entitled to speak in opposition?

The SPEAKER. That is not the fault of the Chair.

Mr. SPRINGER. I appeal to the Chair for my rights under the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must appeal to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is the duty of the Chair to enforce the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I appeal to the Chair to protect me in my rights to oppose this bill under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must appeal to other gentlemen who have their own mode of opposing the measure. The Chair cannot discriminate as to what they shall say.

Mr. KASSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SPRINGER. As we were cut off on the Chinese bill, I want fair play on this bill.

Mr. KASSON. Will it not be proper to inquire of the gentleman recognized to control the time whether he is opposed to the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would be proper, and the gentleman from Alabama has already stated he would take his own mode of opposing this bill. He has been recognized, and the Chair stated to the House that he was recognized in opposition to the bill, and he proceeded.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot go further and say the gentleman shall not proceed in his own way in opposition to the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. But he stated that he was in favor of the bill and would vote for it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the Chair will take the whole statement of the gentleman from Alabama. He did say that he was going to take his own method in reference to the opposition to this bill; but before saying that, he did say positively that he was for this bill and should vote for it, and commenced to complain of the Judiciary Committee of the House for not reporting the Alabama bill back. He is discussing not this bill, but one before the Committee on the Judiciary. I submit that is not opposition to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must appeal to the gentleman from Alabama for a fair division of the time, and not to the Chair.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to ask the Chair if under circumstances like these the opponents of a measure have no remedy, except as the gentleman may see fit to tender it himself?

The SPEAKER. The remedy is with the member.

Mr. BLOUNT. So far as this bill is concerned——

The SPEAKER. The remedy is with the member.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make the point of order, and I want to have a ruling on it.

Mr. BLOUNT. What is the remedy?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already ruled on this on a former occasion.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make the point of order.

Mr. REED. I submit when the gentleman from Alabama has shown he intends really to favor the bill that then the Chair can take notice of his action and can call him to order and cause him to take his seat.

Mr. VALENTINE. I think that should be done.

Mr. REED. I submit, Mr. Speaker, this is to be done in good faith. While the Chair cannot be called on to rule in doubtful matters, while it cannot be called on to rule in opposition to the statement of members, although the task is a difficult and delicate one, yet in order to preserve the rights of the House it would be proper for the Chair to decide whether a member was speaking in opposition under the rules. I am aware of the difficulties, and make these suggestions for the purpose of aiding the judgment of the Chair, and not for the purpose of criticism.

Mr. COX, of New York. There can be no difficulty, Mr. Speaker, if the Chair would ask the gentleman from Alabama on which side he will vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the vote necessarily determines the matter. The gentleman recognized having demanded a second, having indicated opposition, having indicated himself that he was in opposition and said he would take his own mode of opposing the bill, the Chair does not think it can interfere and require the gentleman to take his seat.

Mr. COX, of New York. How will the gentleman vote on the bill?

The SPEAKER. That is not necessarily conclusive.

Mr. VALENTINE. He declares he is going to vote for it. Is not that a sufficient declaration of his views on the bill, that he does not oppose it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair, in the execution of the rules of the House, must leave many things of this kind to the good faith of members themselves. The Chair has no more discretion or power in this matter than the individual members upon the floor.

Mr. COX, of New York. We will be troubled until the end of the session unless this question is decided positively one way or the other.

Mr. McCOID. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will permit this bill to come before the House on its merits. It is a very necessary and meritorious bill, and all we ask is a fair, impartial hearing.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is not on the point of order.

Mr. McCOID. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not make an objection of that kind, but let the discussion go on and let us have a hearing on the merits of the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will take advantage of all the rules of the House in order to secure my rights to oppose this measure.

Mr. HASKELL. I hope the Speaker of this House in the execution of the rules of this House will not go one inch beyond the line of policy which he has indicated. When a member rises and says he speaks in opposition to a bill, I insist that he shall rule, as he has ruled to the end, that the word of that member is binding and conclusive. He is the one to properly determine that question.

Mr. SPRINGER. But if the gentleman says that he is going to vote for the measure, can he be regarded as opposing it?

Mr. HASKELL. And that the Speaker shall not proceed to pass in judgment upon the merits of the manner of the argument a gentleman may choose to make upon the measure. It may be possible for a man to speak in favor of a bill in such a way as to hopelessly defeat it. It is for his own judgment to determine how he shall discuss any proposition; and when a gentleman on the floor says he rises in opposition to a bill, by all the precedents which have been established in the practice of this House that statement must be conclusive.

Mr. BLOUNT. But the gentleman from Alabama has not stated that he was in opposition to the bill. He has stated that he would vote for it.

Mr. ROBESON. When a gentleman is recognized to speak under the rule, he is recognized to speak either in order or out of order. If he speaks in favor of a bill when he is recognized in opposition to it, he is not speaking in order. If he speaks against a bill when he is recognized in favor of it, he is speaking out of order, and any gentleman on the floor may call him to order.

Mr. HASKELL. That is right.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have asked the Speaker to call him to order; and I do now insist that the gentleman has no right to speak in favor of the bill when he was understood as rising in opposition to it. I call him to order myself; and I ask the Speaker to call him to order under the rule. I ask a ruling of the Chair upon that point.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman can call him to order——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois assumes that it is the duty of the Chair to discriminate. Now the Chair decides against that. It is not his duty to discriminate.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I call the gentleman from Alabama to order myself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that there may be just grounds of complaint in many instances, but does not of course say that there is any in this instance——

Mr. COX, of New York. There is not; the gentleman has stated clearly his position.

The SPEAKER. For, under the rules of the House, when a motion is made to suspend the rules and pass a bill, which motion is seconded, there are fifteen minutes allowed in favor of the measure and fifteen minutes against it. The difficulty is that the Chair cannot discriminate and say that a member, if he proceeds with some portion of his remarks which may be construed as favoring a measure when he was understood as rising against it, is speaking in favor of it, or when he was understood as rising to favor it, if some portion of his remarks may be construed as in opposition, that the Chair shall call him to order, and require him to desist. Such matters must rest with the members themselves, and the Chair cannot undertake to discriminate and prescribe what line of argument a gentleman shall follow.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is there to prevent the whole time being occupied by one side, to the exclusion of the other?

The SPEAKER. If a gentleman is called to order who is occupying the time against the measure, the Chair, in the execution of the rules of the House, could only say to the gentleman that he shall proceed in order. But the Chair repeats that it does not undertake to discriminate or decide what method a gentleman may see proper to adopt in the matter of opposing or favoring a measure. That is a question for his own judgment exclusively, and one over which the Chair has no possible control.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. If, during the course of the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama, it shall turn out that though he was understood as rising to oppose the bill he is in favor of it, can the Speaker, under such circumstances, give the other fifteen minutes to the other side?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. That would possibly cut off some of those who are entitled primarily to be heard in its favor; and the Chair thinks that would not be fair. The remedy must be with the members themselves who profess to be in favor of or in opposition to the measure.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. But if the gentleman having the bill in charge and favoring it yields the floor to a member who opposes it, does he not necessarily give up his own right to the time?

Mr. McCOID. I have not yielded my right to the floor. I reserved my time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit that under the rules the gentleman in favor of the measure does not yield the floor to the opponent of the measure for the fifteen minutes allowed under the rule; because a member or some member opposing the measure is entitled to be recognized for that time by the rules of the House.

Mr. HASKELL. I raise the point of order now, and I desire to ask the gentleman from Alabama through the Speaker whether he rises in opposition to the bill or not?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has already stated, but may state again his position.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. While I do not acknowledge the right of the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. SPRINGER. The point of order I make is this——

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois to wait to hear the answer of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would rather make the point of order, so that the gentleman can speak to it. The gentleman from Alabama has already stated he will vote for this bill, and I call him to order and claim that having so stated he cannot be recognized to occupy the time allowed for opposition to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama will state whether he is in favor of the bill or in opposition to it.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. While I do not acknowledge the right of the gentleman from Illinois or any other gentleman on this floor to inquire of me whether I am for or against the bill—waiving that, I will say to the Speaker and to the gentleman from Illinois that I expect to vote for this bill, and my whole object was simply to call the attention of the Judiciary Committee in particular to a bill which I have introduced, which I think has more merit than this.

Mr. VALENTINE. That has nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is where I make the point of order.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] who so very seldom addresses this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is recognized.

Mr. SPRINGER. I decline to take the time from the gentleman from Alabama. I desire to take the floor in my own right.

The SPEAKER. This question has come up on a former occasion. The Chair thinks that the fifteen minutes allowed for opposition to a measure should be given to those who are fairly in opposition. The Chair does not think they should be taken up in favoring the measure, and that then the gentleman who makes the motion should be cut off. The Chair hopes that hereafter the gentleman who demands a second and claims the right to speak in opposition will look to the rule and be guided by it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is recognized.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to call the attention of the House to some objectionable features of this bill. When these features are understood I do not think a two-thirds vote or a majority vote will be given in favor of its passage.

The bill provides for dividing the State of Iowa into two grand divisions, in each of which there will be four places for holding courts. There will, therefore, be eight places in the State of Iowa for holding courts. At each place there will be two terms of two different courts, the circuit and the district court, making sixteen terms of the two courts, and thirty-two terms for the whole of the courts allowed to that State. There will be, under this bill, a grand jury and a petit jury assembling at eight different times in a year, at eight different places. There must be a place provided at each one of these places for holding these courts; there must be a clerk there; there must be records there; there must be a building there, in which to hold the court; and somebody must furnish fuel and lights, and all the other expenses of holding courts in these various places. The expense of impaneling sixteen grand juries and sixteen petit juries to assemble in these place in the State twice a year will be no inconsiderable sum of money, all of which is to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Sir, if this bill passes, it revolutionizes all the United States courts in this country. We have not been in the habit of regarding the United States courts as circuit courts and the United States judges as circuit-riders, going about into every county in the State and holding a Federal court. There are but seven places for holding courts in the State of New York, the most populous State in the Union; a State having the greatest amount of business. In the great State of Illinois, where we have three millions of inhabitants, and which will have twenty Representatives upon this floor in the next Congress, there are but two places for holding United States courts at which grand and petit jurors are assembled, one in the city of Chicago, the other in the city of Springfield. We have found these facilities ample for the purposes for which the United States courts are organized. The State of Illinois, much larger in population and territory than the State of Iowa, can get along with, and does transact all the business of the Federal courts in two places—at Chicago and in the city of Springfield. I hold, and the facts will show, that there is more business done in the Federal courts of Chicago than in all the State of Iowa, and by one judge of the circuit and one of the district court, which circuit judge must hold courts also in other parts of the country.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman answer me a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Is there not complaint in the State of Illinois that the United States courts are not sufficiently near the people, and is there not a demand for more places for the holding of court in the State of Illinois?

Mr. SPRINGER. Not so far as I have heard. There has been no bill introduced and no petition sent here for that purpose that I have heard of.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Would it not be for the convenience of the people of the State of Ilinois if the courts were nearer them?

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not understand the people there are clamoring for a United States court in every county. I hear no clamor of the people for more Federal courts. They have enough of them now. The jurisdiction which it is sought to have exercised by the Federal courts belongs, to a large extent, to the State courts. This is an effort to suppress State jurisdiction and bring all the business of the people in the Federal courts.

Mr. KENNA. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. KENNA. It is a question in the line of the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts in reference to the convenience of the people. I ask the gentleman from Illinois, is it not a fact that economy will be very largely promoted to the Government itself by allowing this court to go to the people of half the State instead of dragging the people of that half of the State as jurors and witnesses to court?

Mr. SPRINGER. I say no.

Mr. KENNA. Well, I say yes.

Mr. SPRINGER. There are to assemble under this bill sixteen different juries, grand juries and petit juries. They are to be impaneled twice a year for courts to be held at different places in the State. Now, in the State of Illinois there are but two places to hold United States courts, and the juries there transact all the business required. It seems to me that this bill is one to muster into the Federal service as grand jurors and petit jurors a great mass of the people of Iowa. It mobilizes the whole people of Iowa and puts them under pay of the Federal Government as grand and petit jurors.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. The gentleman speaks about taking business from the State courts and putting it into the United States court. Does he not know the fact that there is no corporation transacting business, either as a railroad company or as an insurance company, that can to-day go into a State court; not one of them?

Mr. SPRINGER. I admit that our laws permit too great latitude in bringing suits in United States courts; they permit too many of them to be brought in Federal courts which ought to be brought in State courts. But instead of making more Federal courts we should repeal some of the laws which take so many cases into the Federal courts and require them to be tried at home in the county or immediate vicinage where the people live. That is the remedy I would insist upon and not an extension of the system which throws all the jurisdiction into the Federal courts.

What necessity is there for having so many courts in the State of Iowa when Illinois, a much larger State, can get along with two courts? It would be an enormous expense to the Federal Government to establish this system, and I am opposed to it, and I believe the people of Iowa are opposed to it. It seems to me that when the gentlemen on the other side representing that great State ask for some relief they have asked for much more than they are entitled to. It looks as if they had farmed this matter out so as to give them a court in every Congressional district.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] if he is opposed to bringing the courts as near to the people as we can?

Mr. SPRINGER. We have courts near the people. That is just the objection I make to this whole Federal jurisdiction in matters that could be tried in the counties where the people live under a system which is able to afford them all the relief they want.

I refer the gentleman to the efficient judges of the circuit court under the laws of the State of Iowa, where people can get justice at home and not be harassed by being carried out of their counties.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has introduced any bill into Congress to remedy the evil of which he speaks?

Mr. SPRINGER. My colleague from the southern district of Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has introduced such a bill, and has been pressing it, and I am in favor of that bill. It is not necessary to introduce two bills on the same subject; one good bill will do if you will pass it.

Mr. McCOID. I now yield to my colleague, [Mr. DEERING.]

Mr. DEERING. I wish simply to make a brief explanation. I hold in my hand a large number of petitions received from counties in the northern portion of the State, asking that Mason City may be designated in the bill as one of the places at which these courts shall be held. The petitions did not reach me until after this bill had been considered and reported by the committee, and hence these petitioners have not been heard. In justice to them, they being, as I am, in favor of the main features of this bill, I have prepared an amendment, which if adopted would accomplish the object they seek. I will not offer it and press it here, because it is a proposition which ought to be considered in committee in connection with a map of the State. I will simply ask that it be printed in the RECORD with my remarks, and I will then take it and the petitions to the Senate and endeavor to have the amendment put on the bill in that body.

There was no objection.

The amendment is as follows:

Strike out the entire fifth section of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That for the purpose of holding terms of court the northern district shall be divided into three divisions, to be known as the eastern, central, and western divisions.

"The counties of Clinton, Jackson, Jones, Linn, Benton, Black Hawk, Buchanan, Delaware, Dubuque, Clayton, Fayette, Winneshiek, and Alamakee shall constitute the eastern division, the courts for which shall be held at the city of Dubuque.

"The counties of Howard, Chickasaw, Bremer, Grundy, Butler, Floyd, Mitchell, Worth, Cerro Gordo, Franklin, Hardin, Hamilton, Wright, Hancock, Winnebago, Kossuth, and Humboldt shall constitute the central division, the courts of which shall be held at Mason City.

"The counties of Webster, Calhoun, Sac, Ida, Monona, Woodbury, Plymouth, Cherokee, Buena Vista, Pocahontas, Palo Alto, Clay, O'Brien, Sioux, Lyon, Osceola, Dickenson, and Emmett shall constitute the western division, the courts for which shall be held at Sioux City."

Mr. McCOID. I now yield to my colleague, [Mr. CARPENTER.]

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not know that it is necessary for me to make any remarks upon this bill. I desire, however, to say, in answer to some objections which have been made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] that the State of Iowa, as at present divided, has four places for holding courts. Three of those places are in the southern half of the State, and under this bill will come in the southern district.

In the northern district, Dubuque, the one place under this bill for holding the courts, is situated on the extreme eastern boundary of the State. Under the old apportionment I represent the northwestern district of Iowa. Territorially I represent one-fourth of the State, and more than 275,000 of its population.

Under existing circumstances, the people in my district are absolutely denied justice in the Federal courts. No man in my district can reach the Federal courts of the State as at present located without traveling from nearly one hundred to two hundred and fifty miles. The bill proposes to establish three additional places in the northern district for the holding of courts.

In regard to making so many divisions in different districts of the State, allow me to say a word. There is no great commercial city in the State of Iowa. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has spoken of the fact that there are only two places in the State of Illinois—Chicago and Springfield—at which United States courts are held. But it is very natural that in the State of Illinois the business should float to Chicago, because that is the great commercial city of the State. But in Iowa we have no great commercial city. We are an agricultural people; and our courts must necessarily be held in the smaller towns. That is the reason for these divisions and the providing of courts in these different towns in the various sections of the State. The object is the accommodation of the people. Let me ask gentlemen on both sides whether it will be more expensive to bring the courts nearer to the people rather than to take the people to the courts as at present located? This is all I have to say.

Mr. McCOID. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, in these matters we must accommodate our legislation to the changed condition of the country. The Federal courts, by legislation and otherwise, have now a much larger jurisdiction than they formerly had. The country has been more widely settled. Take the State of Iowa, with its population of nearly two millions.

A MEMBER. All of that.

Mr. CANNON. Take the State of Illinois, with its three millions of people, and more. Now, I undertake to say that when suitors reside hundreds of miles away from the court, and mileage as well as other expenses are piled up in getting to the court, to say nothing of the personal inconveniences, it is frequently an absolute terror to parties to become litigants. I would bring the sessions of the United States courts in the great populous States, and perhaps, also, in the more thinly settled States, somewhere within reach of suitors.

I can readily understand why my colleague, [Mr. SPRINGER,] living in the city of Springfield and representing the capital district of the State, may not feel as do many others of us in Illinois who live from one to two hundred miles away from a United States court. I hope this bill will pass, and I trust a similar bill for the State of Illinois will pass before this session shall close.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCOID] a single question. As I understand, this bill provides against any increase of expense to the Federal Government arising from the multiplicity of courts.

Mr. McCOID. It is to be without expense to the Government.

Mr. VALENTINE. And it saves a great deal of expense in the way of mileage.

Mr. McCOID. I yield for two minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MANNING.]

Mr. MANNING. Mr. Speaker, I have not heard any substantial objection to the passage of this bill. I favored it in the sub-committee as well as in the general committee, and from what has been said here against the bill I am reassured in so doing I was entirely right. I was at first reluctant to assent to any such legislation, but my sense of justice made me yield to the urgent appeals of the unbroken delegation of the State concerned, supported by the judges of the Federal courts and all the people immediately concerned and thoroughly acquainted with the merits of the matter. From these sources came to us evidence sufficient to fully satisfy us that the majesty of the law and the public weal would be consulted by the passage of the bill. What additional information could be obtained? Who controverts the facts? If the statements cannot be challenged, then the bill should be promptly passed.

As to the objection that there is an increase of jurisdiction given by the bill, if there is any "rhyme or reason" in that statement I fail to perceive it. The jurisdiction of these courts is determined not by this bill, but by the provisions of the organic law and by previous legislation pursuant thereto.

Mr. Speaker, there is in our Constitution a clause which causes the calendars of our Federal courts to be overburdened with a class of cases that do not properly belong to Federal tribunals. The second section of the third article of the Constitution, which gives to the Federal courts jurisdiction of all cases between citizens of different States, should be stricken out. It is because of the operation of this clause that bills of this kind become necessary. I have had the honor of calling the attention of this Congress to the necessity of amending the organic law in the stated respect, and I hope the proposition will be favorably considered by Congress and the different State Legislatures. But let us not play "dog in the manger." Let us not stand in the way of the public business or the proper administration of the law. Let us not impose hardships or unnecessary burdens upon the people. Let us be practical and judicious in what we do. Let us consider the matter as we find it. If our organic law be amended as indicated, then the districts which may be found unnecessary thereafter can be dispensed with.

One other remark I wish to submit. It has been said that this bill provides for eight different court-houses. That statement is without the slighest foundation in fact; and it argues on the part of those who make that criticism that they have not read the bill at all. I do think that common justice to a committee reporting a bill demands that those who oppose it should have at least a speaking acquaintance with both the report and the bill. This bill provides that no expense shall be imposed upon the Government for public buildings; that the additional courts provided for in the bill shall be held in buildings furnished for the purpose without expense to the United States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McCOID. I will not occupy time in further debate; but I have here a letter received yesterday from Judge Love, the district judge of that district, which gives very conclusive reasons in favor of the passage of the bill. As there is not time to read this letter I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

DUBUQUE, April 26, 1882.

MY DEAR SIR: As you are now in Washington I beg leave to call your attention, and through you the attention of the Iowa delegation, to the absolute necessity of additional judicial force in the Federal courts for this district.

Let it be borne in mind that there is not another State in the Union of anything like our population and judicial business without at least two district judges. Iowa has more than a million and a half of people, and its Federal judicial business is in far greater proportion to that of other States than its population. Iowa, with a large population, has little accumulated capital; the consequence is that its commercial, railroad, and other business is carried on mainly with foreign capital. Nearly all the great railroad corporations, now representing many millions of capital and a vast network of railroads, stretching north and south, east and west to every part of the State, are, in the sense of Federal law as settled by the Supreme Court, citizens of other States. The business of both life and fire insurance in Iowa is almost entirely in the hands of non-resident corporations. In addition to this many moneyed corporations of other States have agencies here negotiating loans to our citizens on real-estate security. The consequence is that there is a vast and increasing litigation within the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, and the fact is that all non-resident suitors, with trifling exceptions, where the sums involved are over $500, transfer their causes to the United States circuit court. Congress has seen fit to provide for the holding of two terms of the circuit and district courts in this State at four different places, making eight terms of each court per year.

The result is that it has become impossible for one district judge to dispose of the accumulated and accumulating judicial business, and without provision for an additional judge there must inevitably be a grievous delay of justice to the prejudice and in some instances the ruin of suitors. Let it be remembered that the circuit judge has a vast empire within his jurisdiction, embracing the States of Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, and Colorado, with two districts in Missouri; insomuch that in the nature of things he cannot even attend the courts in Iowa except at Keokuk and Des Moines; and even at these places it is impossible for him to remain but a very short time at any term. The result unavoidably is that the judicial business of Iowa in both the district and circuit courts is cast almost entirely upon a single district judge. Is this right? Is it just to the suitors of the court, especially when we consider that there is no right of appeal where the amount involved is less than $5,000.

Let us look at this matter in still another aspect. Mr. Lane, late United States district attorney of this district, informs me that he appeared before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate two or three years ago and proved to their satisfaction by the reports of the Attorney-General that Iowa then was the fifth State in the Union in Federal judicial business.

Thus Iowa, with a million and a half of people and a judicial business greater in amount than any State in the Union except New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois, has but one district judge, while Arkansas, with a third of its population and judicial business, has two judges, Tennessee three, Alabama three, Wisconsin two, Missouri two, Michigan two, Florida two, Georgia two, Mississippi two, North Carolina two, and South Carolina two. Now, compare the population of Iowa with the several States just named and it will be apparent that gross injustice has been done to Iowa with respect to its judicial rights and necessities.

Thus, while Iowa has not less than a million and a half of inhabitants, with a rapidly increasing population, the foregoing States contain, respectively, the following population: Arkansas, 802,560; Tennessee, 1,542,463; Alabama, 1,262,794; Wisconsin, 1,315,480; Missouri, 2,168,804; Michigan, 1,636,331; Florida, 267,351; Georgia, 1,539,048; Mississippi, 1,131,592; North Carolina, 1,400,047; South Carolina, 995,622.

Iowa twenty years ago, when its population was not 500,000 and its business less in proportion than it now is, was put by act of Congress in a class with regard to judgeship and salaries with such States as New Hampshire, Vermont, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Delaware, Michigan, Wisconsin, Maryland, and Arkansas. Some of these States have been by act of Congress divided into two districts, but Iowa with her million and a half of people, (1,624,620,) her eleven Representatives in Congress, and her tenfold increase of judicial business, remains in the class of districts where she was placed twenty years ago.

Allow me to say, in conclusion, that I make my appeal for relief entirely upon public grounds. Personally I ask nothing and expect nothing, and although the simple truth is, that I am made to perform the duties of circuit judge with the salary of district judge of the lowest class, I ask no change in this regard. My doctrine is, and always has been, that the public officer who does not see fit to accept the compensation which the law awards him can surrender his position to some one who may be willing to perform the service upon the same terms.

But what I do say is that common justice to suitors requires that adequate provision should be made for the speedy trial of their causes. At the late term at Council Bluffs, seeing that without some extraordinary efforts many suitors would be compelled to leave the court without a trial of their causes and suffer the consequences of accumulating costs, I held night sessions during almost every day of the term. I am now under the same sense of necessity holding night sessions here, and yet it is manifest that a number of cases in which parties are present with witnesses will have to go over to another term; and I know that at the coming term at Des Moines in May the same evil will of necessity be repeated.

If we had another judge, with or without a division of the State into two districts, there would be no difficulty in disposing of the business in a satisfactory manner.

It has long been our practice, sanctioned by law, where there are two judges at any term to sit separately for the trial of jury causes and the hearing of all matters in equity.

If we had another district judge, even without a division of the State, (if that cannot be accomplished,) the practice referred to would enable the court to dispose, without delay of justice, of all judicial business in the State.

I am very truly yours,

J. M. LOVE.

Colonel D. B. HENDERSON.

Mr. SPRINGER. One word of explanation. I did not state that this bill required eight different court-houses, but that it provided eight different places for holding courts.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. McCOID to suspend the rules and pass the bill, there were—ayes 102, noes 5.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. McCOID and Mr. HOLMAN as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 149, noes 3.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

LOYAL CLAIMS.

Mr. CHAPMAN. I move that the rules be suspended and the following resolution be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, the 13th day of May next, be assigned for the consideration of House bill No. 5899 to authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to consider and pass upon certain claims now pending before them, after the reading of the Journal or the expiration of the morning hour, and said consideration to continue from day to day until disposed of, not to interfere with the consideration of general appropriation bills and revenue bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Shall the second be considered as ordered?

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the bill be read, so we can understand it. As a part of the resolution I call for the reading of the bill to which reference is made by title.

The SPEAKER. Is debate required?

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the reading of the bill referred to by title in the resolution as part of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. SPRINGER. How are we to know what the bill is unless it is read?

Mr. CANNON. Have we had a second?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized in opposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a second, so the House may understand what it is called to vote on. I trust my friend will have the bill read and explain the effect of it. I do not wish it understood I am opposing the measure or that I called for the second for the purpose of opposition. I only desire the House shall understand exactly what it is doing.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, the second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 5899) to authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to consider and pass upon certain claims now pending before them.

Be it enacted, &c., That the accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to consider and pass upon the claims now pending before them of loyal citizens mentioned in sections 300 A and 300 B of the Revised Statutes, for the use and occupation of real estate under contract express or under circumstances where an intention to make compensation for such use ought to be presumed, and for materials used in the construction of forts situate in the loyal States taken by the military authorities of the United States during the rebellion: Provided, That nothing hereinbefore contained shall be construed to allow compensation for the damage to or destruction of such real or personal estate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before my friend from Maryland takes the floor I wish to state to the House the effect of this bill. The accounting officers of the Treasury have held, under the second and third sections of the act of 4th July, 1864, under which accounts for quartermaster and commissary supplies are being adjusted and sent down annually to the House for necessary appropriation, that rents for real estate during the operations of the late war were not covered. The object of this bill, as I understand it, is to put a different construction on those two sections, 300 A and 300 B of the Revised Code. The construction proposed to be put on them is that the accounting officers of the Treasury shall consider rents for real estate during the operations of the war as well as other claims.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let me ask what is the probable amount of such claims now covered by this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have seen some statement from the Treasury officials on that subject, perhaps also from the Quartermaster-General, but it is not possible to conjecture exactly what number will come in under this proposed construction.

I presume the gentleman from Maryland can give the House full information on the subject.

Mr. SPRINGER. I should like to have the opinion of the gentleman from Indiana. Does it not amount to millions?

Mr. HOLMAN. I could not say so much.

Mr. WILLITS. Has not the Court of Claims jurisdiction of rents of property under express contract, and does not this propose to give jurisdiction over contracts implied as well as expressed?

Mr. HOLMAN. This is to enlarge the jurisdiction. I will reserve my time until I hear from the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana does not properly comprehend this subject. The object of this bill is simply to correct the construction which has occurred at the Treasury Department within the last two years. No question had ever arisen until the fall of 1880 as to the authority of the accounting officers to decide claims referred to in this bill. The claims which have been adjudicated by the accounting officers of the Treasury of this class of cases already amount to millions. The number of claims remaining before the accounting officers do not exceed $100,000. It would be an act of gross and manifest injustice, as it appeared to the Committee on War Claims, to say that these few remaining claims now before the Treasury should not be adjudicated on the proofs there filed, which proofs have been put there at the expense of the claimants and by the invitation of the United States Government.

The claims which are referred to in this bill are claims for the use and occupation of property of loyal citizens situated in loyal States by the Government, where there is a contract either expressed or implied on the part of the Government to pay for such use or occupation. I do not believe that there is a gentleman here upon this floor who, if we can properly get the matter before him, will hesitate for an instant to say that these claimants ought to be heard. It is no extension of the jurisdiction already existing over such claims. It brings no new class of claims against the Government before the Department for adjudication. It is only saying that this trouble which arose during the administration of Secretary Sherman shall be remedied, and that the law shall be explicit where there is a question of doubt.

This trouble in 1880 arose with the Secretary of the Treasury and some of his assistants on the ground that the claims that they had been taking cognizance of for the last sixty-three years, since the year 1817, and which Congress had been appropriating money to pay, were not authorized to be considered although millions had already been adjudicated and only perhaps not exceeding $100,000 remain to be considered; and therefore this measure is proposed as a means of settling a doubtful point. It enlarges no class of claims which have heretofore been considered. It opens no new avenue of claims against the Government. It simply provides that the doubt raised in the mind of the Secretary of the Treasury and his assistant secretaries shall be taken into consideration and determined, and there the matter rests. In the report which is now on the files of this House you will see that that is all that is proposed. The accounting officers of the Treasury who have had cognizance of these claims find that the few remaining claims which have not been adjudicated have all the equities and rights which other claimants had whose claims have been settled, and they plainly say so in their reports filed with this bill, but these are now withheld for the reason that I have stated, and this is simply to allow them to have a hearing.

I did not propose to go into the merits of the question to-day, because the object of the resolution which I am directed to offer by the committee for the consideration of the House is simply to grant a day for the consideration of the measure proposed, and when that is done we shall invite careful attention to it, and feel satisfied that there will not be a dozen gentlemen here present who would make any objection to the matter if we can bring it before them in proper shape. We believe the unanimous sentiment of the House will be that it is right and proper that these claimants should be heard. It is not under section 300 A or 300 B of the Revised Statutes. These sections are only referred to because they designate the class of citizens, namely, loyal citizens residing in loyal States, and these would have had judicial construction and settlement as to their meaning.

Now, as I say, millions of dollars have been paid heretofore for lands occupied by the United States forces during the war and at other times under an implied contract to pay rent, and the consideration of questions of that character have gone on in the Treasury until 1880. Millions of dollars have been adjudicated in that way, and probably, as I have said, not more than one hundred thousand remain to be adjusted.

I will repeat, we do not ask any new power or any extension of jurisdiction which has not already existed, but simply ask that the few humble cases remaining before the Department shall be considered by the Secretary as these numerous cases have been already adjudicated prior to 1880. That is all that is proposed, and I do not wish to occupy the time of the House in discussing the merits of the case any further at this time. I did not propose to enter upon it at all, but only rose for the purpose of asking the adoption of this resolution for the establishment of a day for the consideration of the bill, and I can assure the House, as indeed they may take it for granted from the fact that this is a favorable report from the Committee on War Claims, and as they have reported favorably in not more than half a dozen cases it may be assumed that this matter had careful consideration, and should be a passport to the consideration of the House.

This report has the indorsement of nine out of ten members of the committee, and we ask that a day shall be set apart to consider the question, so favorably was the committee impressed with its justice and right. After a full examination of the question the committee have decided to ask that the House fix a day for its consideration. That is all. The House may be sure that the bill presented does not trench upon any grounds which will open up new classes of claims or extend the jurisdiction of the accounting officers, or it could never have passed that committee. It does not bring before the Government any claim that was not properly before it heretofore. It only allows the consideration of claims which have been held in abeyance until the question of doubt is settled.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHAPMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. If you pass this bill do you not expect practically to wipe out the statute of limitations?

Mr. CHAPMAN. Not at all. It has no such effect. The bill expressly refers to claims now pending, and does not take cognizance of any new cases whatever.

Mr. WILLIS. But this bill assumes that the Department has not now jurisdiction of these cases, and you propose by this bill to give it jurisdiction.

Mr. CHAPMAN. No, by no means. The trouble, as I have stated, is in the construction of the law as given to it of late by the Secretary of the Treasury. He has a doubt as to the right to consider these cases. That does not exist with the Auditor of the Treasury. He says there is no doubt as to it. All of these cases are already in the Treasury and are being prepared for the adjudication of the Secretary by the subordinate officers, but the Secretary says to Congress, "I have doubts in my mind as to my power to consider them." The statute of limitation commenced January 1, 1880, and no claim arising since that or no claim filed since that date can be considered at all. This bill, therefore, refers only to claims that are now pending, and the statute cannot run against cases already in court.

Mr. CAMP. If the Secretary of the Treasury has jurisdiction, then what is the necessity for passing this bill?

Mr. CHAPMAN. Simply because he has doubt on the question, and we want to remove that doubt.

Mr. WILLITS. Is not the reason because the Court of Claims has jurisdiction over contracts express or implied?

Mr. CHAPMAN. Not at all.

Mr. WILLITS. Has the court not jurisdiction where there is an express contract for rent; where it is a question of rent for a piece of property under express contract? If not, let the gentleman cite the statute that will sustain his position. Under this bill you are giving the Department jurisdiction of subject-matter over which it has no jurisdiction now, and never has had; and not only that but you put a construction on the term "implied contracts" which opens up the whole field.

Mr. CHAPMAN. The gentleman is evidently mistaken. He does not properly apprehend the object of the bill. But here are the words of the Comptroller on that subject:

> There has been much conflict of opinion as to the power and authority of the accounting officers to audit claims of this kind, but during several years past it has been held that the Auditor and Comptroller are not authorized to approve a claim for the use or occupation of real estate in any case except where rent has become due by the terms of an express contract.

If you can establish that the rent has become due by express contract, you relieve them of the trouble as to the jurisdiction.

Mr. WILLITS. Then your bill provides for cases of contracts express as well as implied?

Mr. CHAPMAN. Express or implied.

Mr. WILLITS. Why not stop there? But you go on and give a definition of what constitutes implication.

Mr. CHAPMAN. I will answer that question cheerfully. I am the author of the bill. As originally drawn, the expression used was "contracts express or implied," but some gentlemen on the committee, very punctilious in this matter, and very much afraid the Government might be mulcted in something that it ought not to be, suggested we should use the expression in the bill, and as the idea intended is the same, no objection was made to the change of expression, though not suiting me as well, because the expression "express or implied" is a judicial expression.

Mr. WILLITS. I desire to ask the gentleman another question. You say the Department would have jurisdiction over contracts express but not implied. Now you propose to give them jurisdiction over implied contracts.

Mr. CHAPMAN. And it is exactly that which the Comptroller of the Treasury thinks the Department may not have the authority to consider. Let me read one further remark from the Comptroller of the Treasury.

Mr. VALENTINE. Will the gentleman from Maryland allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHAPMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. VALENTINE. Is it not the intention or object of the bill to change the provisions of section 300 of the Revised Statutes——

Mr. CHAPMAN. Not at all.

Mr. VALENTINE. Which expressly says there shall be no payment of claims for occupation of or injury to real estate, &c.?

Mr. CHAPMAN. Not at all. The gentleman is reading a section that applies to States in rebellion.

Mr. VALENTINE. Would it not have that effect if this bill should become a law?

Mr. CHAPMAN. Not at all. There are now pending, as I have already said, before the officers of the Treasury certain classes of claims, the evidence of them proved and filed. They are for rents and do not touch the two classes of claims referred to by the gentleman from Nebraska. Those are for quartermasters' stores and commissary stores.

Mr. VALENTINE. Why, then, not be satisfied to meet the intention now stated by the gentleman from Maryland? The bill is much wider in its scope than he states its object is.

Mr. CHAPMAN. This bill applies only to claims of loyal citizens residing in loyal States.

Mr. BUCKNER. I will say to gentlemen on the other side the object is to get a day to consider the bill and not to argue it now.

Mr. VALENTINE. I understand that, but if it is such a bill as it seems to me it is, I will vote even against allowing a day to consider it.

Mr. CHAPMAN. It is not such a bill as the gentleman supposes. I beg that gentlemen will be satisfied they are right before they refuse to give a day for its consideration. If they apprehend there is any harm in it, it is because they do not properly understand the bill. As I said before, the Committee on War Claims of this Congress would not have recommended this bill till doomsday if there was any harm in it. It is simply an act of obvious and most righteous justice to claimants who were authorized and invited by the Government to file their proofs. They have done it, and now you say the few remaining claimants shall not be heard when millions have already been paid. This introduces no new claim, no new matter, but simply applies to those claims now pending with the proofs now filed.

I desire to read another passage from the opinion of the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, and I beg gentlemen who have any doubts as to this will give their attention for a few moments. The Second Comptroller says:

As this kind of property—

Going on to speak of rents and engineers' stores—

As this kind of property is not deemed to be quartermasters' stores, within the meaning of section 300 A of the Revised Statutes, it is argued that if the special authority given by that section, and by the succeeding section, was necessary in order to authorize the auditing of accounts for quartermasters' stores and for subsistence, like special authority is necessary to authorize the accounting officers to audit claims for property taken without contract and used in the construction of fortifications; and upon the strength of this argument it is held that this class of claims is not within the jurisdiction conferred. While so holding, I am aware of the apparent inconsistency of making the question of pay depend upon the use to which the property is devoted, when either of two purposes may have been equally beneficial to the Government. The same officer may have been acting as engineer and as quartermaster at the same time, and quantity of timber may have been seized by his orders, and used, in part, for purposes of fortification and in other part as quartermasters' stores. The part used for the purpose last mentioned can be lawfully audited and allowed in pursuance of the statute above referred to, while so much as was used solely for purposes of fortification does not fall within the purview of that statute, nor has it been provided for in any special statute conferring jurisdiction on the accounting officers.

I am of opinion that existing law does not authorize the accounting officers to audit claims for forcible seizure or occupation in either of the two classes above mentioned.

Judge E. W. Keightley, Third Auditor of the Treasury, in several communications addressed to the Committee on War Claims, thoroughly reviewing this whole subject in a masterly and judicious manner (all of which communications are made part of this report accompanying this bill) remarks:

The claimants should have a remedy; and doubts having been raised as to the power of the accounting officers in the premises, the proposed legislation appears to me to be wise and just.

Mr. WILLITS. Then it comes right back to the first question. This subject of rent never has been submitted to the Department. The recovery of rent is under the clause in reference to express contracts, and the Court of Claims has jurisdiction of it.

Mr. CHAPMAN. The gentleman is entirely wrong. At the proper time for the consideration of this question I shall invite the attention of gentlemen to the reports of the officers of the Treasury, where they say they have paid millions of dollars on lands occupied under implied contract, and it is an impious denial of the simplest justice on the part of the Government to say now to these claimants, "We have invited you by a construction and course of proceeding for upward of sixty years under a statute passed in 1817 to file and prove your claims before the accounting officers of the Treasury; you have gone to that expense and trouble, and we have paid multitudes of just such claims on the judgments rendered by the accounting officers of the Treasury, and continued to pay them up to 1881; we close this door in your face and you are barred by the statutes of limitations from presenting your claims anywhere else, even if any other tribunal was ever opened to you." This highwayman's justice of "stand and deliver" would not be the verdict of this House, in my humble judgment, if we could secure the attention of the House to the matter.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Under the terms of this bill there is of course a new jurisdiction conferred upon the accounting officers of the Treasury; that of course is inevitable. The only question is, whether or not the powers conferred upon the accounting officers of the Treasury by sections 300 A and 300 B of the Revised Statutes shall be enlarged.

Of course the Court of Claims has jurisdiction of all cases of contracts, expressed or implied; and that court would have jurisdiction of the class of claims covered by those two sections of the Revised Statutes if it were not for the fact that that jurisdiction is barred. It is therefore proposed by this bill that the accounting officers of the Treasury shall, in addition to the other claims before them, consider these two classes of claims: first, for rents, and secondly, for material used in the construction of forts. Therefore, one of the main questions is, whether or not upon this subject the statute of limitations shall operate or not.

Mr. WILLITS. It really does open up the statute of limitations.

Mr. HOLMAN. It would necessarily have that effect.

Mr. CHAPMAN. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him for a moment——

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CHAPMAN. I would inquire how it would have that effect, when it refers solely to claims now pending before the accounting officers of the Treasury and which have been filed for years?

Mr. HOLMAN. The bar of jurisdiction applies to the Court of Claims, not to the accounting officers of the Treasury. Of course if the accounting officers of the Treasury have jurisdiction of these claims, the reason they are barred from going into the Court of Claims is, that the statute of limitations intervenes.

I would say, further, that this bill comes from the Committee on War Claims, and my friend from Maryland [Mr. CHAPMAN] has been authorized to report it. It is not a measure in regard to which I feel at all safe that the jurisdiction might not be opened up too broadly and too widely. It always seems to me to be the safer and the wiser plan not to open the bars heretofore created by limitations.

I however only oppose the measure of my friend, coming from a committee of which I am a member, to the extent of calling the attention of the House to the exact nature of the measure, to the fact that it enlarges by construction the provisions of the two sections of the act of 1864.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. CHAPMAN] to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which has been read.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 42, noes 50.

Mr. CHAPMAN. I call for tellers.

The question was taken upon ordering tellers; and there were but eight in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The affirmative is not one-fifth of a quorum, and tellers are not ordered.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Am I not entitled to tellers? No quorum voted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did not make that point, but called for tellers.

So the motion to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution was not agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. PEIRCE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 3548) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

MIAMI LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. HASKELL. I move that the rules be suspended so as to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 328, to provide for the sale of the lands of the Miami Indians in Kansas, and to pass the same with an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, and after that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the unallotted lands of the Miami Indians in Kansas, including the school sections, shall be disposed of in the following manner, to wit:

That each bona fide settler occupying any portion of said lands at the date of the passage of this act, and having made valuable improvements thereon, or the heirs at law of such, who is a citizen of the United States or who has declared his intention to become such, shall be entitled at any time within one year from the passage of this act to purchase the land so occupied and improved by him not to exceed one hundred and sixty acres in each case, according to the Government survey, at the appraised value thereof, as heretofore ascertained by the Secretary of the Interior, in accordance with the provisions of the act of March 3, 1873, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe. And such persons who are entitled to purchase said lands as aforesaid shall be permitted to make payment therefor in cash or in three equal annual installments, the first installment to be payable on the day of the entry of the land and the remaining two installments annually thereafter, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the date of entry.

SEC. 2. That all lands not purchased by said settlers at the expiration of six months from the date of this act, together with all the unoccupied and unallotted lands of the Miami Indians, shall be offered at public sale in the usual manner under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, at not less than the appraised value, notice of said sale to be given by public advertisement of not less than sixty days in three newspapers having general circulation in the State of Kansas; and any tract or tracts not then sold, together with such as may be hereafter purchased by said settlers, but wherein default may be made in the payment of any portion of the purchase-money or the interest thereon as herein provided, shall be thereafter subject to private entry at the appraised value of the same.

SEC. 3. That the net proceeds of the sales of said lands, after defraying the expenses of the sale, shall belong to said Miami Indians and shall be disposed of as now provided by law.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

"SEC. 4. That the provisions of this act shall not in any way affect the rights or claims of those individual Miamis or persons of Miami blood or descent who are named in the corrected list referred to in the amendment of the Senate to the fourth article of the treaty of June 5, 1854, or their descendants; and before the proceeds which have been or may be hereafter realized from the sale of said lands shall be applied for any purpose or distributed, the Secretary of the Interior shall obtain the opinion of the Attorney-General as to what rights or interests, if any, the said persons have or had in and to said lands; and if in his opinion they are or were entitled to have parcels of said land allotted to them under the provisions of said treaty, and failed to receive the same, then the said Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay to each of said persons out of the proceeds of the sale of said lands as aforesaid a sum equal to the value of two hundred acres of said land as appraised for the purpose of making said sale, for and in lieu of their interest in said lands, and that of the surplus of said proceeds which may then remain, if any, that they receive their pro rata share thereof the same as other members of said late tribe of Miami Indians."

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand a second on this bill; it is quite an important measure.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the second will be considered as ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think we had better have a vote on it.

Mr. HASKELL. I hope the gentleman will not demand a vote, when I tell him that this is a mere extension of an old law. While it is long in phraseology, it is a bill prepared by the Department and passed by the Senate under the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Indian Affairs of that body. It is a mere re-enactment of an old law for the purpose of giving settlers additional time to pay for their land.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will consent that the second be considered as ordered by unanimous consent.

There was no objection, and the second was ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. Inasmuch as this is disposing of Indian lands, I trust the gentleman will not only make a statement of the bill but also show what has been the action of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. DWIGHT. I would like to ask the gentleman how much land is involved in this bill?

Mr. HASKELL. About ten thousand acres. These are not Indian lands; at least they are not occupied by Indians, nor have they been for some twelve or fifteen years past, the Indians having left them years ago and gone to the Indian Territory. This is simply a bill to re-enact an old law and to pay the proceeds of the sale of this land over to the Indians to whom they belong.

Mr. DWIGHT. What are the lands appraised at?

Mr. HASKELL. From one and a quarter to ten dollars per acre. They were appraised by the Department, and are to be sold at the appraisement.

This bill was drawn at the Interior Department. It passed this House in the last Congress, but failed to reach the Senate in time. At this session it has been passed by the Senate. It is unanimously approved by the Committee on Indian Affairs. It is a Department bill. At the request of members from Indiana I have added to it a section designed to preserve the rights of the Miami Indians of Indiana to any of the proceeds of these lands, if in the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States they should be entitled to any.

Mr. DWIGHT. When were these lands appraised?

Mr. HASKELL. In 1873.

Mr. DWIGHT. Should they not be reappraised now?

Mr. HASKELL. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs thinks not. The lands would have been heretofore sold, and this bill would not now be necessary but for the fact that the appraisement made in 1873 was so high that nobody would buy. When the lands were thrown upon the market under the provisions of the law only one piece of land of one hundred and sixty acres was sold. The settlers are now willing to buy these lands, and the Department asks for their sale. This is a bill of which my friend from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] had charge, with the exception of the section in regard to the rights of the Miami Indians of Indiana.

Mr. SCALES. I desire to ask whether that last section has been submitted to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs?

Mr. HASKELL. It has been.

Mr. SCALES. Will the gentleman be kind enough to make an explanation about that? The other part of the bill I think is right.

Mr. HASKELL. The last section is with reference to the Miamis of Indiana, who think they have some claim upon the proceeds of these lands. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs does not think they have. The section is so drawn as to require the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior and Attorney-General with reference to this claim on the proceeds.

Mr. DWIGHT. It is nine years since the appraisement of these lands was made?

Mr. HASKELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DWIGHT. Does not the gentleman think that although the appraisement may then have been too high the lands would be appraised higher now?

Mr. HASKELL. Oh, no, sir. Besides, the cost of reappraisement would counterbalance the increased valuation of the lands, even if a few pieces should now be appraised higher than the former appraisement. Then, again, this land, with the exception of about two thousand acres, is occupied by settlers who have vested rights there. By this bill we simply extend the time of payment; so that there cannot well be a reappraisement except as to those two thousand acres, and any possible advance in the appraisement would hardly pay the cost of a commission.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HASKELL to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the amendments, it was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. COLERICK. I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD remarks upon the amendment to the bill just passed.

There being no objection, leave was granted. [See Appendix.]

TAX ON NATIVE WINES.

Mr. CLARDY. I move to suspend the rules so as to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of House bill No. 920, and pass the same.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 920) to amend section 328 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to the tax on native wines.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 3328 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3328. On all sparkling wine made in the United States, except that made by the regular process of natural fermentation of carbonic acid gas in the bottle and on all imitations, there shall be levied and collected a tax of ten cents per bottle or package containing not more than one pint, and twenty cents per bottle or package containing not more than one quart, and at the same rate for any larger quantity of such merchandise, however the same may be put up or whatever may be the package; also on all compounds of wines and liquors by the infusion of any matter to be sold as a substitute for wine. Still wines made from grapes, currants, rhubarb, or berries grown in the United States, not compounded with any foreign substance, shall be exempt from special tax. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall cause to be prepared suitable and special stamps, denoting the tax herein imposed, to be affixed to each bottle or package containing imitation wine, by the person manufacturing, compounding, or putting up the same, before removal from the place of manufacture, compounding, or putting up; and said stamps shall be affixed and canceled in such manner as the Commissioner may prescribe; and the absence of such stamp from any bottle or package containing such merchandise shall be prima facie evidence that the tax thereon has not been paid, and such merchandise shall be forfeited to the United States. Any person counterfeiting, altering, or reusing said stamps shall be subject to the same penalties as are imposed for the same offense in relation to proprietary stamps."

Mr. WILLIS. I ask a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. MILLS. We want a second that the bill may be explained.

The SPEAKER. Shall the second be considered as ordered?

Mr. CAMP and others objected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMP] will take their places as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 102, noes 49.

So the motion was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] is recognized to control the time in support of his motion.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] represents the opposition to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] demanded the second.

Mr. CLARDY. I ask that the report of the Committee on Ways and Means with reference to this bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 920) to amend section 328, Revised Statutes, in relation to the tax on native wines have had the same under consideration, and respectfully make the following report:

The committee received from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue a letter approving of the principles of the bill and the manner provided in it for a protection against adulterated and imitation wines.

The committee invited Messrs. J. A. Bridgeland, of Indiana, and Isaac Cook, of Saint Louis, to address the committee and present arguments in favor of the passage of the bill. We deem it proper to submit, as a part of our report, the statements of these gentlemen, which are as follows:

"Mr. J. A. Bridgeland, of Richland, Indiana, appeared before the committee by invitation, and made the following statement:

"Mr. Chairman and gentlemen: In my eight years' experience as United States consul at Havre my attention was called especially to the character of the wines exported from France to the United States. Being satisfied for the last several years that there were not grapes enough grown in France to furnish wine to her own population of 37,000,000 of people, I cast about to see by what means the large exports of wine were made to the United States, Russia, and other parts of the world, and the investigation which I made resulted in the discovery of the fact that all manner and kinds of wines from Spain and other regions were imported into France to be manipulated by French compounders. Ship-load upon ship-load of a low grade of Spanish wines arrive weekly at Havre, Bordeaux, and other points in France. These wines are manipulated by putting a very small quantity of French wine with them, the introduction of alcohol, extract of logwood, and other substances. My attention was called to the purity of our own wines in comparison, by having used some of our American wines in France, which astonished French connoisseurs by their quality. In fact, I sent from Havre a bottle of the champagne made by the American Wine Company of Saint Louis to General Noyes, our minister at Paris, about two years ago, and asked him to have it analyzed by a Government chemist there, which was done, and the certificate of the chief chemist reported it a perfectly pure wine, with but 9 per cent. of alcohol, and fully mediocrity in quality, which satisfied my mind that it was first class wine, as the French people are not likely to give any article manufactured outside of France credit for being better than it is.

"On my return home last September I took a trip to California, and paid special attention while there to the subject of grape-growing and wine-producing, more particularly because I had seen samples of California raisins only six weeks before in Malaga, Spain, which, I am glad to say, by reason of their superior body and general quality alarmed the Spanish raisin-grape producers. From what I saw of the grape-growing interest in California I believe that if our grape-growers and wine-makers are given due encouragement by proper legislation against adulterated wines, foreign and domestic, the day is not far distant when the grape grown for wine-making purposes will be one of our most important land products. The failures of the crops of grain in Europe for the last four years have given us a good demand for our surplus; but, in my opinion, unless we diversify our crops at home more than we have done heretofore, with two or three consecutive good grain crops in Europe we shall find that we have too much land in wheat and corn. I sincerely trust that the bill now before your committee, providing that all spurious wines of domestic manufacture shall be labeled as such and a tax imposed upon the same, may meet with your hearty approval as well as that of Congress. With proper care I believe that within a very few years we shall be able to ship in immense quantities the wines of our country to consumers almost everywhere throughout the world. Pennsylvania, Ohio, Missouri, and in fact nearly all our Middle, Southwestern, and Western States are, in my opinion, deeply interested in this subject."

Mr. Isaac Cook, of Saint Louis, addressed the committee as follows:

"Mr. Chairman and gentlemen: It is a well-known fact that the wines of this country are commanding the attention of the wine trade not only in the United States but also in France, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, and Spain. Even when the soil and climate of this country were first recognized as favorable to the growth of superior grapes, the more experienced growers abroad felt that the years of their profitable American trade were numbered, and that at no very distant day they would find the American wine crop challenging comparison with their home productions at their own business doors; and they were right. With the energy which has marked the development of other commercial interests in this country, those in the grape-growing districts who looked forward to the production of luscious wines secured the most experienced aid in cultivating grapes for wine that could be found, and the result was the production of our superior American wines,

"As soon as any particular brand of wine gets a reputation hundreds of poisonous inventions are manufactured and the good wines are thereby seriously ruined. It is much easier to adulterate wine than ale or beer, especially beer; and nothing so exasperates a lover of the pure wine, well and properly made, as to know that instead he has drank a vile imitation, and he is sure to know it soon from its bad effects. I have given the matter some attention simply to guard against adulterations for my own sake, and I sincerely hope for the success and prosperity of our native wines, especially the American champagne. Many of the so-called American champagnes are impositions on the public. They are imitations of the genuine article, and are manufactured from poor grapes and berries. While only a few weeks old this 'wine' or liquid is bottled green, and pretended age is given by charging it with carbonic-acid gas and other sleight-of-hand preparations, the peculiar effect of which, in connection with this 'wine,' is to create a rank poison in the human system. Let any doubter make a business of drinking it and he will soon be convinced.

"Now, I take the ground that champagne made in the old natural way, fermented in bottle, is as good in this country as the best made in Europe, especially if produced from the Catawba grape, grown to perfection and properly handled by experienced wine-makers, with suitable cellars and appliances. The experience of the manufacturers of the pure article who are now actively engaged in making a pure champagne from thoroughly ripe Catawba grapes, without gas or adulteration, shows that if native wines are to be run out of the market by foreign brands it will be solely on account of the adulterations made by speculators, who thereby ruin the reputation of American productions. The raw wine is cleared by the use of aluminum, gelatine, and alum, the latter imparting to it great brilliancy, and it is treated with a flavoring sirup which is charged like soda water with carbonic acid, by filling the bottle under a fountain. In this process the wine is liable to be impregnated with both lead and copper, which have the effect of disorganizing alike the wine and consumer's stomach. Nausea and headache are among the ill results of drinking 'sparkling wine' thus prepared, or any of the adulterated still wines which are 'doctored' to suit the taste. All adulterated wines are injurious to the human system, and of course they are destructive of the reputation of pure wines, because they are palmed off upon the people as the genuine article."

Your committee report back the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Speaker, the principles of this bill are commended by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and it has had the unanimous approval of the Committee on Ways and Means. It provides that spurious wines shall be labeled as such, and that a tax shall be imposed upon them. That it is in the interest of the great grape-growing region of the country will, I think, be made manifest by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] who reported the bill, and to whom I now yield my time.

Mr. DUNNELL. How much time remains for the affirmative?

The SPEAKER. Three minutes.

Mr. DUNNELL. I will reserve that until gentlemen have been heard on the other side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.]

Mr. WILLIS. I understand the gentleman from Texas does not desire to occupy the time, and, if so, I will occupy a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] will be recognized in opposition to the motion.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I do not represent a wine-making constituency. What I shall say upon this bill, therefore, will be prompted not by the fear that any pecuniary interest of my district or State will be injuriously affected by its passage, but by the belief that it is wrong in principle and will work great private and public injustice.

What is the effect of this bill? What is its scope and purpose? Is this House prepared upon one hasty reading by the Clerk to answer these questions? Does the report of the committee answer them? I have read it repeatedly, and I say to the members of this House without fear of contradiction that there is neither an explanation nor justification for this legislation to be found in it.

It has just been read, and what is it? Simply the statements of two gentlemen who appeared before the committee, one of whom, and the only one whose statements are directly pertinent to the bill, is, as I shall presently show, the direct if not the only beneficiary under it. And what are their statements when examined? Only this, that Europe has been sending large quantities of adulterated wines to this country, and that these adulterated wines are injurious to the human system. Ergo, such importations should be stopped. To this I presume every gentleman here would give his prompt assent, and if the bill had been limited to this and its provisions properly guarded, I for one should have given it my hearty support. I recognize it to be both the right and the duty of Congress to enact laws which will prevent the adulteration of food and drink. There is crying need for such legislation. But let us not be misled by our desire to secure pure drink into the advocacy of a bill such as this, which I claim goes far beyond such objects and practically builds up a great monopoly.

What are the words of the bill? Are they limited in their meaning to merely spurious or adulterated wines? Are they aimed only at the impure and worthless article? I do not so understand them. They are broad, comprehensive, and far-reaching in their significance. Here are the words of the bill: "On all sparkling wine made in the United States, except that made by the regular process of natural fermentation of carbonic-acid gas in the bottle, and on all imitations, there shall be levied," &c. Also, "on all compounds of wines and liquors by the infusion of any matter to be sold as a substitute for wine." Is any one here prepared to say how far such descriptive words as these reach? Is any one prepared to state the practical effect of such legislation? I think not.

We have heard only an hour ago most eloquent and forcible denunciations of the national-bank act, because of the exclusive privileges which it secures. Will those gentlemen who so strongly denounced exclusive privileges when that interest was appealing to us now right-about-face and support a bill which grants an exclusive privilege not to all men under certain conditions, but, as I am informed, gives a monopoly to one single individual out of the fifty million people of these United States?

This bill, instead of being designated as it is, should be entitled a bill for the benefit of Isaac Cook, of Saint Louis, Missouri.

Mr. SPRINGER. In what respect?

Mr. WILLIS. The effect of this bill will be to exclude all the native wines of this country which are subjected to the process of impregnation by carbonic-acid gas. Are the representatives of the people ready to enact a law which gives the exclusive manufacture and the monopoly of the wine interest of this country to one man? If so, let them cast their votes in favor of this bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman let me ask him whether this bill interferes with the right of any person in the United States to manufacture pure champagne wine?

Mr. COX, of New York. What is pure?

Mr. WILLIS. It does not in terms.

Mr. SPRINGER. By natural process.

Mr. WILLIS. But it declares that certain wines shall be free from tax, and it so happens in the mysterious providence of things that the only man who manufactures wine in a way which does not come within its prohibition is Mr. Isaac Cook, of Saint Louis, Missouri.

Mr. HATCH. That is not so; the gentleman never fell into a greater error in all his life. I am sorry that he has made that statement on the floor of this House.

Mr. WILLIS. Then I most cheerfully withdraw it.

I would not knowingly do Mr. Cook or any other citizen any injustice. I know that this bill is currently known in the country as the "Cook bill." I have seen it so alluded to in the papers, and have heard it so referred to repeatedly around this Hall by its friends, and hence I made the statement. My objections to its passage are neither increased nor diminished by the information that Mr. Cook is not its exclusive beneficiary. I know that in terms it declares all wines which are impregnated with carbonic-acid gas shall be excluded.

Mr. SPRINGER. Taxed.

Mr. WILLIS. Shall be taxed. This will impose an unjust burden upon all manufacturers of wine who differ with Mr. Cook in their process. Why should such a discrimination be made against them and in favor of the Cook process? What right have we to make such a distinction? The California wines and all dry wines, when subjected to the process of impregnation by carbonic-acid gas, would come within this bill. Does any gentleman deny that? Werner's Extra Dry, a very popular wine manufactured in the city of New York, would come under the ban of this bill. Will any one dispute that? Why should the American Congress attempt to drive from the market—to exclude from use—these wines? Will it be contended here that they are injurious? I deny it.

I say to this House, on the authority of one of the most distinguished physicians in the city of Louisville, one of these wines thus excluded, Werner's, has been recommended in cases of sickness in preference to the best foreign champagnes.

If it were necessary I could refer to the testimonials of the most distinguished chemists of the country in favor of these wines. Will it be said here that a little carbonic-acid gas renders them unhealthy? If so, then you had better pass a law to tax and prohibit soda-water, because, as I am informed, it is manufactured upon the same principle. Let us not, under the cry of adulterated wines, commit an unjustifiable wrong. Let us not by our legislation deprive the indigent sick of wines which are equally beneficial as imported champagnes, and which can be bought for one-fourth the price. Let us say to all manufacturers of wine that they must stand upon their own merits.

Let us legislate for the interests of the many and not to build up the fortunes of a few. "Equal rights to all, exclusive privileges to none," is sound, old-fashioned, Democratic doctrine, and I hope by the vote upon this bill will be demonstrated to be also sound Republican doctrine. I will now yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I wish there were more time to consider this bill, because underlying it is a principle of discrimination in favor, I will not say of one man, but of one class of men and against another class of men.

Two kinds of wine are made in this country. One is said to be pure, because made by natural fermentation; the other is said to be imitation or impure, because carbonic-acid gas is injected into it by machinery, the same as soda fountains are impregnated with it.

The question for gentlemen here to decide is whether they will give the sanction of the United States Congress to an additional tax, with our large surplus, to increase our internal-revenue system to that extent, so as to make a discrimination in favor of one class of wine-makers and grape-growers and against other wine-makers Why should we do it now? Men who live North and South, in New York and San Francisco, are making these cheap wines. They are innoxious. They have been so decided, and if the committee had heard other men here they would never have reported this measure. I have in my hand the certificate of the most eminent chemists and physicians in New York City stating there is nothing unwholesome, nothing injurious about these wines of Werner & Co., which are sought to be stricken down by this bill by adding a tax on them and relieving others from taxation. Let me call attention to that certificate. It is as follows:

Reasons why the bill proposing an amendment to section 3328, Revised Statutes, whereby a tax is imposed on "carbonated wines," should not receive the sanction of the Committee on Ways and Means, respectfully submitted by A. Werner & Co., 308 Broadway, New York.

1. That this tax would bear with great and peculiar hardship upon the grape-growers, who would be compelled to dispose of their grapes to the great corporations, who alone conduct the manufacture of sparkling wines by the fermenting process. These wealthy corporations could at pleasure depress the prices of grapes, as by this tax they would be relieved from the competition of buyers of grapes who make sparkling wine by the new process.

2. That it would in effect tax a process and not the product—a measure which would be contrary to the sound public policy, as it would tend to retard inventions and progress of useful arts.

3. That it would work discriminately between citizens of different States, as both processes convert the same native product into a sparkling wine.

4. That it would tax the process only without distinction as to being made from native or foreign wines.

5. That it would open the door for fraud by importation of wines made by the same process in Europe, and irresponsible parties manufacturing here, who might, by attaching a label similar to well known foreign brands, evade this tax, and also by parties who might manufacture by both processes in order to pass the bulk of their manufacture as untaxable goods.

6. That it would be ossible imp to detect such frauds, as the product of both processes cannot be distinguished by analysis or any other means known to science.

7. That artificially aerated wines are wholesome, as far as aeration is concerned, is proven by the enormous consumption of different aerated beverages in the United States. The most eminent physicians recommend these beverages.

8. We substantiate these statements by references and certificates, on the following page, of the highest chemical authorities, who have devoted great attention to this special branch of science, and which certificates have been submitted to the Committee on Ways and Means in 1874 and 1880.

9. That this tax would yield little or no revenue, as the new process is yet in its infancy, and could not survive this oppressive tax if wines made sparkling by the old process were not subject to a similar tax.

10. We do not desire to avoid payment of a tax. If in your judgment it should be necessary for revenue, we would cheerfully pay any tax imposed, if such tax did not discriminate unfavorably against sparkling wines made by the new process in favor of the old process. We ask that a tax on native sparkling wines, if imposed, shall be upon all sparkling wines, without regard to any process of preparation.

To the Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives:

GENTLEMEN: Having been informed that it is proposed to place a tax on wines impregnated with carbonic acid artificially on the ground that they are unwholesome, I take the liberty of addressing you to say that this statement is untrue.

Carbonic acid gas produced artificially is in no way unwholesome, and in the impregnation of wines with gas prepared by chemical agents is not objectionable.

Moreover, no chemist could decide by analysis whether the gas contained in a sparkling wine had been produced naturally by fermentation or artificially by chemical agents. The enforcement of a discriminating tax based on this distinction would therefore be practically impossible.

Very respectfully, yours,

C. F. CHANDLER, Ph. D., M. D., LL.D.,

President of Health Department, New York; Professor of Analytical and Applied Chemistry in the School of Mines, Columbia College; Professor of Chemistry in New York College; Professor of Chemistry in the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York.

The following authorities have certified to the wholesome properties of mineral waters and other beverages artificially impregnated with carbonic-acid gas:

The late Professor John Torey, of the United States Assay Office, formerly professor of chemistry at the College of Physicians and Surgeons; Dr. Walter Gibbs, professor of chemistry at Cambridge; Dr. Benjamin Silliman, professor of chemistry at Yale College, New Haven; Dr. Charles A. Joy, professor of chemistry at Columbia College, New York; Dr. George T. Barker, professor of toxicology and physiological chemistry of the University of Pennsylvania; Dr. Julius G. Pohle, professor of chemistry of the faculty of the American Institute.

The Metropolitan Board of Health of New York, composed of eminent physicians and chemists, declared by resolution adopted May 24, 1866, that carbonic-acid water (water artificially impregnated with carbonic-acid gas) was an innocent beverage.

This paper shows that these eminent professors and scientists certify that these wines are entirely wholesome, and they are recommended to persons for medical purposes in many instances. Now, Mr. Speaker, why discriminate against them? Why should Congress at this time go out of its way to strike down an existing industry and elevate another at its expense, when they should all stand upon the same foundation? Why, Mr. Speaker, chemistry is just to-day doing almost as a science what nature often requires years to accomplish. Chemistry will tell you that there are short methods of doing things which are done sometimes by natural processes, but which require years to accomplish. The method of injecting this carbonic-acid gas into our native wines is entirely in consonance with the higher refinement of chemistry, and our action with reference to this matter should be in consonance with the higher refinement of legislation in the interest of all the people of this country.

Mr. WILLIS. I now yield the remainder of the time to the gentleman from California, [Mr. ROSECRANS.]

Mr. ROSECRANS. Mr. Speaker, I have received letters and petitions from a large number of wine manufacturers in my State protesting against the passage of this bill. I am not yet sufficiently informed of the motives which induced the framing of this bill to be able to speak any further than this, as to the objects or the effects of it; but I believe that among all the wine-growers that I know of in California, certainly all that I have any communication with, there is scarcely a single one who does not inject into these native wines carbonic-acid gas by artificial processes. I do not presume that any member of this House can be induced to think that there is any injury to health by following that process, or entertain the slightest idea that there is any poisonous or deleterious effect produced by it. I am not prepared to say how many of our California wine-growers would be affected by this bill, but I have one petition signed by ten of the leading firms, the largest in fact in the State, who protest against its passage.

Mr. CLARDY. Will the gentleman permit me to say that I am in receipt of a telegram which I have shown several members of his delegation from the Vinicultural Society of that State unanimously recommending the passage of the bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the telegram be read.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I can only say that it has not been presented to me and I know nothing whatever of it. In support, however, of what I have said, and in deprecation of any hasty action, I will repeat that from San Francisco, where are congregated some of the largest houses engaged in this business, and where the greatest amount of capital in the manufacture of native wines is owned, is a very significant fact that I have not one letter in favor of the Cook bill—not one.

Now, it may be my misfortune not to have been communicated with by my constituents on that subject, but I think it very strange certainly that I have not received something from some one of the many persons engaged in that business which would indicate that they favored this measure, especially if they have communicated with other gentlemen upon that subject.

I have petitions signed by eight or nine responsible manufacturers, who have large capital invested in the business, protesting against it. That, I believe, is all I desire to say upon the subject. Permit me to repeat, however, that it is a strange thing, in my mind, that I have no information excepting in opposition to this measure. I do not believe that the bill should be voted for without further information. For one I shall certainly not do so without looking further into it, as this wine-growing interest is one of the largest and most important in California. I do not doubt that spurious wines are imported, but I shall not vote for this bill until further advised upon the subject. I hope it will not be adopted without mature consideration.

Mr. DUNNELL. There are three minutes remaining on this side. I yield one minute to the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE.]

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, I was not aware that this bill was coming up for consideration to-day. I have received letters from both interests in California, some advising me to vote for this bill and some protesting against its passage. I believe the Vinicultural Society of California represents the largest wine-growing interest in that State, and I am informed that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] has been sent a petition by that society in favor of the passage of this bill. I know this society. I know its plan of operations. I am acquainted with its business.

I believe that the great bulk of the champagne manufactured in California is manufactured by the regular process of fermentation. I believe that Congress has the right to prevent the adulteration of wines, liquors, and food; and for that reason I shall vote for this bill, believing that in doing so I conserve the best interests of my constituents.

Mr. COX, of New York. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him if he would vote to tax the method and not the article itself?

Mr. PAGE. Whenever a subject-matter of that kind comes up I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. DUNNELL. I was instructed to make the report which has been read from the Clerk's desk in support of this bill. The committee gave a hearing to both sides, to those in favor of the wine made by natural processes of fermentation, and to those representing wines manufactured by the use of carbonic-acid gas. The hearing was satisfactory to me, at least, and to a majority of the committee; I do not remember whether the committee was unanimous or not.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] admits there are two classes of wine in the market. And he, inadvertently perhaps, says that one is the pure and the other the impure. I will not say that much. The one is a quality of wine produced by the natural processes of fermentation; the other is produced by the use of carbonic-acid gas, and it is generated by the use of marble dust.

There is in the country everywhere a call for the pure as against the impure wine, and the grape-growing States, so far as I have been informed, are unanimously in favor of this bill, believing that by its passage these manufactured wines, these low-grade champagnes, will be substantially driven out of the market, and there will come into use the wines not made simply by Mr. Isaac Cook, of Saint Louis, but made in other parts of the country; wines which may be made everywhere and anywhere and by everybody in the country; wines made out of the juice of the grape, the product of natural fermentation.

The report of the committee has been read, and the evidence that was brought before the committee very plainly shows that there is in the market a very large amount of impure wines, grossly adulterated wines. The gentleman from New York says, "Why strike at a recognized industry?" An industry that is in hostility to other industries must yield if less worthy of support than the other industries. The production of wine by the pure processes of nature should rather receive protection than the production of the adulterated, artificial, and far more hurtful wines.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, there were—ayes 66, noes 60.

Mr. HATCH. I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 23, not a sufficient number.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering tellers, there were—ayes 20; not one-fifth of a quorum.

So tellers were not ordered, the yeas and nays were refused, and the rules were not suspended, two-thirds not having voted in favor thereof.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN DETROIT, MICHIGAN.

Mr. LORD. I move that the rules be suspended so as to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4701) to provide for the erection of a public building at Detroit, Michigan, and that the bill be passed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a suitable lot of land in the city of Detroit, and cause to be erected on the ground so purchased a building suitable for the accommodation of the courts of the United States, of the custom-house, post-office, pension-office, and other Government offices in that city: Provided, That if the said Secretary shall deem it advisable and economical to do so, he may, instead of purchasing an entire lot, buy sufficient land adjoining the ground on which the United States Government building now stands, and erect the building herein provided for on said land, using such portion of the said building, or material thereof, as may be profitably done: Provided further, That no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Michigan shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the land so purchased, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owners thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein; and the site shall be of sufficient extent to leave an open space on all sides of the building to be erected, including streets and alleys, of at least forty feet.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury, in case he shall select and purchase a lot of ground of sufficient extent, irrespective of and not including the site now occupied by the United States as a post-office site, shall be authorized and directed to sell, at public sale, for cash, after thirty days' advertisement of the time, place, and terms of sale, and after the erection of the building provided for in the preceding section, the property in the city of Detroit now owned by the United States and occupied by the United States courts, the custom-house, the post-office, and other offices of the United States; and the money received from such sale shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury, in any and every case of an attempted sale, shall be authorized and empowered to reject any bid which in his opinion shall be less than the value of said premises, and reoffer them for sale in the manner above provided for until the said premises shall bring a fair price.

SEC. 3. That the cost of the lot of ground, in case an entire new lot shall be purchased, and the building to be erected thereon as herein provided, shall not exceed the sum of $600,000; and in case the Secretary of the Treasury shall purchase adjoining ground to that on which the Government building now stands, the cost of such additional ground and building to be erected thereon shall not exceed the sum of $500,000.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I call for the reading of the report.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Shall a second be considered as ordered? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Now I call for the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York take the floor in opposition to the bill? The report can only be read in the time allowed for debate.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I do not rise to oppose the bill or to take the time allowed for opposition from the gentleman from Indiana or any one else. But as the bill calls for an expenditure of $600,000, I should like to hear the report read.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection the report can be read in the time allowed for supporting the bill.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee have taken House bill No. 745 into consideration, and find the following facts:

There is now a public building at Detroit, but it is wholly inadequate and unsuited to the purposes of the Government. The appropriation for purchase of site and erection of said building was made more than thirty-five years ago, and was at the time sufficient, but not in any degree in excess of the then necessities of a city of about forty thousand inhabitants.

Before the building so provided for was ready for occupancy in 1861, the population had reached forty-five thousand, and with such an advancing tendency as to make it even then apparent that the time would soon come when the accommodations would be entirely inadequate.

The city has now reached a population of 125,000 and more, and is environed with suburbs which comprise altogether 150,000 inhabitants dependent upon the Federal office at Detroit for post-office facilities, and all transactions connected with custom-house, United States courts, United States engineers, United States internal revenue, Life-Saving Service, Signal Corps, Marine Hospital Service, Light-House Board, United States marshal, United States district attorney, pension office, United States land office, and paymaster United States Army.

For several years past thirteen different office rooms, or suits of rooms, have been rented in different parts of the city by the Government of the United States to accommodate such of its officers as could not find quarters within the present Government building.

This entails great inconvenience upon the several officers, much greater inconvenience on the public, and charges the Government with an expense for rents of $6,000 per year.

The city of Detroit is now increasing its people and its business more rapidly than ever before, and if an appropriation for a Federal building shall be made at this session, the population will approximate closely to 200,000 before it can be erected and ready for occupancy.

While the growth of the city has much to do with the necessity of enlarged provision for Federal offices, the growth of the State is also to be considered, as is also the vast increase of commerce on the lakes, a very considerable portion of which, whether belonging to Michigan or other States, has business to transact at the Government building at Detroit.

In 1860, when the present building was approaching completion, the population of Michigan was 749,113. It has now more than doubled, being 1,684,059.

For custom-house purposes, Detroit represents one-third part of the State; for pension-office purposes, the whole of it; for internal-revenue collections one-fourth part, and in amount of business nearly two-thirds; as to the Federal courts, one-half the State, and for all the other offices named, except the post-office, the whole of it.

The magnitude of the business transacted at Detroit on account of the Government of the United States will, in part, appear from the following:

The total receipts at the custom-house for ten months of 1881 to October 31	$390,550 53
Value of exports and imports, same time	$7,651,684 00
Vessels arrived and cleared during 1880	11,396
Tonnage	2,419,052

This is nearly equal to the tonnage of American vessels entered at all the seaports of the United States in 1881, which is reported by the Treasury Department to have been 2,919,149.

The amount of internal revenue collected at Detroit in 1881 was $1,223,504.44.

The business of the post-office at Detroit is vastly in excess of its facilities. It collects, irrespective of its money-order business of two and one-quarter millions for 1881—

For postage, including envelopes, cards, and stamps sold	$286,837 92
At an expense of	69,771 19
Affording a net income to the United States of	199,066 73
The money-order business involves, for 1881, orders issued to the amount of	$2,226,777 67
And orders paid	$1,248,734 29
The number of registered letters and packages received or forwarded in 1881	760,458
Number of letters delivered and number collected by the carriers and otherwise	14,919,809
In its mailing department it has transmitted letters, cards, papers, and packages to the number of	29,884,548

Beside 1,161,663 pounds of other mailable matter.

The committee therefore report herewith a substitute for the original bill, with a recommendation that it pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LORD] to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was the time occupied in the reading of the report taken from the time of those favoring the bill or of those opposing it?

The SPEAKER. From the time of those favoring it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to call attention to the fact that while the city of Detroit is a large city, with an extensive and growing commerce, still it has a public building that in the main hitherto has answered for the purposes for which such a building is required by the Government. If this bill had been recommended by the Treasury Department, the Post-Office Department, the Department of Justice—the three Departments of the Government interested in the construction of public buildings—I would yield my own convictions on the subject very cheerfully and vote for the bill. But I must insist that the passage of bills of this kind through this House in such large numbers as we are likely to pass them, without any reference to the demands of the public service, without any recommendation by the heads of Departments interested, is the most unwise policy possible.

We do not act on this principle in regard to any other business. We consult the heads of Departments in reference to other matters of business placed under their direction. But we erect public buildings with reference to the demands made by the different cities and the views of the citizens and their local interests, without any reference whatever to the requirements of the Government.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I wish to ask my colleague the question, whether the facts stated in the report are not sufficient to enable the House to determine the propriety or necessity of this building as well as the Post-Office Department or Treasury Department could do so?

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend is a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of this House, and has been a member of more than one committee; and he must know that the reports made to the House are almost uniformly based on information furnished by gentlemen who, to say the least of it, are exceedingly anxious for the success of the measure.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Let me ask my colleague another question. Cannot the House get at reliable information as well as the Treasury Department or the Post-Office Department?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think these Departments can furnish the most accurate information. We are calling for it every day, and we regard it as exceedingly valuable information. My friend from Illinois [Mr. SINGLETON] ordinarily will hesitate to act upon a subject affecting one of the Departments of the Government until he gets full information.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. If my friend will permit me to say——

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. As one of the committee I have examined with great care all the statements contained in this report, and I believe every one of them to be reliable.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no doubt but that my friend believes them.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Do you not think that this particular bill is one that ought to be passed?

Mr. HOLMAN. I could select four or five out of the sixty bills that are now before the House, to which perhaps there would be no special objection. But with some sixty bills, ranging all the way from $60,000 to $600,000——

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Is it not better to let each bill stand on its own merits?

Mr. HOLMAN. With such a large number of bills pending gentlemen are driven to the necessity of either supporting them all or opposing them all. I am not at all supprised that my friend from Illinois [Mr. SINGLETON] wishes somewhat to escape from the responsibility of this great body of bills, the largest number of such bills ever before any Congress. There are some sixty bills pending for public buildings, as though we were anxious to find methods to expend the surplus in the Treasury.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I think the gentleman greatly overestimates the number of bills. I have not counted them, but I do not think there are that many.

Mr. HOLMAN. I mean those that have come from the Senate as well as those reported from the committee of the House.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Many of those from the Senate are duplicates of the House bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. I concede that some are duplicates; but the bills from the Senate and those reported from the committee of the House mount up to the neighborhood of sixty bills all told. Now, for a people in debt as we are, and heavily taxed as we are, to appropriate money in such vast sums without recommendations from the heads of the Departments, as though we were seeking means to deplete the Treasury, is a policy which I cannot indorse.

Now, if there had been only five or six bills of this kind reported for buildings at important points, and appropriating only moderate sums of money, I should be inclined to acquiesce in them. But almost all of these bills appropriate at least $100,000 each, many of them appropriate exceeding $200,000, where a plain, solid, substantial building, at a cost of forty or fifty or sixty thousand dollars, is all that is required so far as the public interest is concerned.

Now, if you wish to embellish our cities, to erect stately marble palaces all over the country as monuments of the resources and inexhaustible treasures of the American people, then I concede this policy would be well enough. But for a plain republican government, which to be honest must be frugal, in my judgment this system of expenditure is entirely without justification or excuse.

I have seen none of these buildings so far erected that indicate any economy on the part of the Government; on the contrary, extravagance seems to be the controlling motive. Gentlemen regard themselves as exceedingly forbearing if they ask a small sum for any such purpose. I am aware that bills of this character uniformly pass when they come before the House. All I can do is to seek to perform my duty as a member of this House and under the responsibilities that devolve upon me as an individual.

Now, while I might support this bill with a moderate appropriation of money, inasmuch as it has been stated that the present building in that city is not sufficient for the purposes of the Government, still I must protest against these magnificent appropriations of the public money for the embellishment of our cities as entirely un-American, and as imposing taxes on the whole people for the benefit of some favored localities.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LORD] to suspend the rules and pass the bill which has been read.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes, 121, noes 14.

So (no further count being called for, and two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT JACKSON, TENNESSEE.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5575) providing for a public building at Jackson, Tennessee, and that the same be passed at this time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the United States circuit and district courts, post-office, and other Government offices, at the city of Jackson, Tennessee. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $50,000: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than forty feet, including streets and alleys; and no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Tennessee shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owners thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

Mr. HOLMAN. For the purpose of having the report read I demand a second of the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection, and the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now call for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

In presenting a substitute for the bill providing for the erection of a public building at Jackson, Tennessee, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds herewith beg to submit the following statement of facts:

In the city of Jackson, Tennessee, there are annually held two terms each of the United States circuit and district courts for the counties of Benton, Carroll, Decatur, Gibson, Henderson, Henry, Madison, McNairy, Hardin, Dyer, Lake, Crockett, Weakly, and Obion, representing a large portion of the population of the State.

There is now no public building in Jackson for the holding of said United States courts, as the supreme court of the State, the common law and chancery court, and the county court occupy the court house, a State building, almost the entire year. The erection of this public building will also afford quarters for the post-office, which is now inadequately accommodated in a rented building, and could also be utilized for the accommodation of the internal-revenue office of the eighth district of Tennessee, which should be removed to Jackson, as it would there be located more centrally and easy of access to the people of the district.

Jackson is a rapidly-growing city, geographically nearly the center of the western grand division of the State. It has large and rapidly-developing commercial and manufacturing interests, being now the crossing of two trunk lines of railway, and is the terminus of other projected railroads soon to be built.

The sum asked in this bill, $50,000, does not contemplate any extravagance or large expenditure, but is merely sufficient to provide suitable accommodations for the United States courts and post-office, and the convenience of the large population transacting business therein. Your committee, therefore, recommend its passage.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. ATKINS, and it was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof; and accordingly the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT DENVER, COLORADO.

Mr. BELFORD. I move that the rules be suspended so as to take from the Speaker's table and pass at this time Senate bill No. 24, for the erection of a public building at Denver, Colorado.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to procure a proper site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults, in the city of Denver, Colorado, for the accommodation of the United States district and circuit courts, post-office, land office, and other Government offices in said city, at a cost not exceeding $300,000, including cost of site, which site shall be such as will afford an open space between the building hereby authorized and any other building of not less than forty feet; and the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose herein mentioned: Provided, That no money shall be used or applied for the purpose mentioned until a valid title to the land for the site of such building shall be vested in the United States; and no expenditure of money shall be made on the building proposed to be erected on said site until the State of Colorado shall duly release and relinquish to the United States the right to tax or in any way assess said site or the property of the United States that may be thereon, and shall cede jurisdiction over the same during the time that the United States shall remain the owner thereof.

Mr. HOLMAN. For the purpose of having the report read I demand a second of the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. This is a Senate bill.

Mr. BELFORD. There is no report here accompanying this Senate bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has it not been considered at all by the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. BELFORD. They have reported a bill similar to this.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is there not a report accompanying that bill?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. There is a report accompanying the House bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. May not that report be read?

Mr. CAMP. It is not worth while bothering with the report. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist upon the reading of the report.

Mr. MANNING. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANNING. It is quite manifest that nothing will be accomplished by the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] except to delay action on this bill. As I am opposed to delay, I want to inquire of the Chair if the gentleman has any right to call for the reading of a report which was made on a bill not now before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand that a second had been demanded.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; I demanded a second.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection, and the second was ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I stated to the Chair that my object in demanding a second was that the report might be read. If there is a report accompanying the House bill, which I understand is identical in form with the Senate bill, I ask that the report be read.

The SPEAKER. It will be read in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 81) to provide for a public building in the city of Denver, Colorado, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report:

That the said building is intended to provide accommodations for the United States circuit and district courts, the post-office, land office, and other Government offices in said city. The city of Denver is the capital of the State of Colorado, and contained, according to the census of 1880, 35,629 inhabitants, while in 1870 it had but 4,759. It is at present growing rapidly; the buildings are of a very permanent character, either stone or brick, and property and rentals both rapidly advancing in price. It is the commercial metropolis of the State, as well as of the region known as the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains. The present rentals for Government offices, as learned from the Secretary of the Treasury, amounts to $3,700. These leases were taken several years ago, when property was much lower in renting, and leases could not probably be renewed for less than double that sum.

The court-rooms are over store-rooms in a noisy part of the city, the ceiling 12 feet, size of room 40 by 36, ventilation very bad. The third floor is occupied by the marshal's office and other offices, and the continual tramping above and noise around greatly trouble the sessions of the court, which are held in May and October, usually three months, more or less, each term. The cases tried are important, often involving large interests and long trials.

The business of the post-office furnishes probably as reliable data as can be had of the rapid growth and present importance of the city. From a statement submitted by William N. Byers, postmaster, it appears that the general business for the past five years is as follows:

Total receipts, 1877	$62,018 45
Total receipts, 1878	90,229 96
Total receipts, 1879	138,005 84
Total receipts, 1880	214,954 93
Total receipts, 1881	260,535 22

The net profit to the Department in 1881 was $96,392.01; receipts on money-orders in the year 1881, $564,276.39. Total number of pieces mailed, including letters, postal cards, newspapers, and packages of merchandise, 11,580,500 in the year 1881.

Your committee is informed that no expenditure has ever been made by the United States for public improvements in the State of Colorado, except for the purchase of a small building for the purposes of a mint, many years ago.

In view of the rapid appreciation of property in the city of Denver, the increase of rentals, the absolute necessity for increased accommodations, and the fact that it is the capital of the State, your committee recommend the erection of a suitable Government building, and report back the bill by substitute, and ask its passage, limiting the ultimate cost to $200,000.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill it was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

PUBLIC BUILDING, GREENSBOROUGH, NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. SCALES. I move to suspend the rules so as to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of House bill No. 5546, and to pass the same.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 5546) for the erection of a public building at Greensborough North Carolina.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the United States courts, post-office and other Government offices, at the city of Greensborough, North Carolina. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $50,000: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than forty feet, including streets and alleys; and no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of North Carolina shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owners thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

Mr. HOLMAN. For the purpose of having the report read, I demand a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

By unanimous consent a second was ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now call for the reading of the report upon the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill for the construction of a public building at Greensborough, North Carolina, beg leave to submit the following report:

Greensborough is situated in the western judicial district of North Carolina. This district embraces an area of about 25,000 square miles, and its population is about 537,454. It is larger in extent of territory than the State of South Carolina; larger than the four States of Vermont, Rhode Island, New Hampshire, and Connecticut, and more than three times as large as New Jersey or Massachusetts. The population of the city is about 6,000, and it is a growing place. The business done in the courts, district and circuit, during the last five years amounts to about 3,273 cases; the number of cases on the dockets of said courts during that time aggregated 4,092, not including business done at chambers. About 744 cases are returned yearly, and the greater part of the work necessary to dispose of them is done in Greensborough. There are two regular terms of the district and of the circuit court held here each year, lasting two weeks each term, and these are not sufficient, and frequent special terms are held to dispose of the business.

The district judge resides here, and his courts at chambers are frequent and important. The court is most accessible and convenient to all parts of the district. There are now four railroads leading to Greensborough, and by midsummer there will be another.

For ten years the county court-house and jail have been used by the Federal courts and officers free of charge. If a reasonable rent was exacted, as is done in other places, the rent for these houses would amount to near $800. The clerk now rents an office at $100; the marshal rents an office at $150; the register in bankruptcy has an office; the collector of internal revenue had his office here for twelve years; it has been removed about twenty-eight miles away, but must eventually be here, and an office would cost the Government not less than $200; the judge of the court must have an office; the postmaster rents an office, but pays the rent himself, at about $125.

All the papers and records of the courts in bankruptcy are on file here and exposed to damage and to loss, and there is no fire-proof building or vault in which to preserve them.

The amount of revenue from the post-office for the first quarter of 1879 was $1,341.30; for third quarter, 1879, $1,206.97; the aggregate amount per annum is about $4,800 or $5,000, according to statements furnished by the Post-Office Department.

The amount of revenue collected in the counties composing this judicial circuit, embracing the fifth and four-fifths of the fourth revenue districts, is about $1,813,775. About this amount has been paid by the people of this district annually for the past ten or twelve years. Less than 3 per cent. of one of these annual collections would furnish the sum asked for in this bill. There never has been expended one dollar of public money for the improvement of any part of this district.

Your committee therefore conclude that it would be for the benefit of the public service to authorize the erection of a substantial public building in the city of Greensborough, and recommend the passage of the bill by substitute herewith submitted.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. SCALES to suspend the rules and pass the bill, it was agreed to—two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

PUBLIC BUILDING, COUNCIL BLUFFS, IOWA.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move to suspend the rules so as to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of House bill No. 4177, and pass the same.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 4177) for the erection of a public building at Council Bluffs, Iowa.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the post-office, internal-revenue offices, and other Government offices at the city of Council Bluffs, State of Iowa. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $100,000: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than forty feet, including streets and alleys; and no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Iowa shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owners thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

Mr. HOLMAN. In order that the report may be read I demand a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

By unanimous consent, the motion was seconded.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Council Bluffs is the metropolis of Western Iowa; its population about eighteen thousand inhabitants. There are in this city terms of the United States circuit and districts courts, the Government paying to the county of Pottawattamie a rental of about five hundred dollars per year for the use of the county court-house. This building is inadequate and very unsafe, as in case of fire, or even burglary, valuable papers of much importance would be wholly unprotected. The other offices of the Government, register in bankruptcy, marshal, and United States attorneys, are endangered by the same exposure. The Council Bluffs post-office is of very great and growing importance, as may be seen by exhibit attached, and the building now used and occupied by the Government, at a rental of $900 neither affords protection for the property in the office and valuable passing through, nor convenience for clerks and other employés of the Government. The city of Council Bluffs has a railroad system that contributes largely to its wealth and prosperity, it being now the terminal point of eight trunk railroads—two now in course of construction and to be finished within a few months; machine-shops in connection with these roads are located in the city. We find that Council Bluffs is a distributing point for a large portion of Iowa, an important part of Nebraska and the Territories north, and are convinced a city of such business resources, evidencing rapid progress, and promising stability in the future, is entitled to a public building for the use of courts, post-office, and such other Federal offices as are now, or may hereafter be, established in that city, and your committee recommend the construction of such building at a cost not exceeding the sum of $100,000.

The exhibit of business in the Council Bluffs post-office for the year 1881:

Stamps sold		$12,794 03
Envelopes sold		5,608 02

General expense account	$3,551 00
Postmaster's salary	2,900 00
		6,451 00
Net income of post-office		17,895 86

Your committee submit a substitute for the House bill No. 308, and recommend its favorable consideration.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I move that the House adjourn. I think we have passed bills enough to-day. [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky, there were—ayes 23, noes 69.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion of Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky, was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] to suspend the rules and pass the bill which has been read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a marvelous similarity in these reports, except as to the names of the places and the amounts of money to be expended. This bill proposes an appropriation of $100,000, but notwithstanding the glowing language of the report it seems to me that an appropriation of $50,000 would be very ample for all purposes, if the two bills last passed are fair samples of what would be reasonable and proper. I do not know what explanation the committee gives for making this discrimination. I should hardly think it would be more expensive to erect a public building in Iowa than in North Carolina; yet the difference in the amount of money to be expended is very material, while the wants of the Government in the two places are substantially the same.

The necessities of many of our counties in the various States for public buildings and offices, including the court-house, are far greater than the necessities of the United States Government in connection with public buildings. The Government can require at most only a court-room, a post-office, an internal-revenue office, a custom-house, and in rare cases a pension-office—five offices in all. In our different counties an appropriation of $50,000 is generally regarded as a handsome provision for all offices required in the administration of our local affairs, the offices required being much more numerous than those needed by the Federal Government, yet the lowest sum named up to this time in any of these bills has been $50,000, and in some cases the amount has reached $600,000.

If the earnings of the people coined into revenue and paid into the public Treasury must be squandered in embellishments, let us at least be a little modest in the character of those embellishments. The Government in these cases needs a plain, substantial, sufficient building—nothing more; and any gentleman can see that if the needs of a growing town in the West are amply supplied by a public building costing $50,000, a structure for the purposes of the United States Government should not cost more. Yet this bill proposes an appropriation of $100,000. Are we simply to pass these bills as reported without the exercise of any judgment on our own part? Why, sir, I could name town after town in my own State having stronger claims for a Federal building than any of these places, except one, for which we have provided buildings to-day—towns paying much larger revenue, and having at least equal demands for a Government building.

I am aware that any opposition to this class of bills is futile; that they pass as a matter of course. But I desire to enter my protest against the passage of them without any legislative consideration whatever. For all practical purposes we might just as well take the sixty public-building bills pending upon the Calendar and pass them by a single vote.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, in reply to what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has said, I wish to remark that whenever a proposition comes here for the erection of a public building in a sparsely-settled section of the country it meets opposition from some quarter. It is not our fault that we have not a greater population than we have.

It is not our fault, Mr. Speaker, our country is not more populous than the region from which the gentleman from Indiana comes. Whenever a proposition is made here to erect a public building anywhere in our country the opposition is made to it that we do not pay the same tax, internal-revenue or otherwise, that is paid in other sections of the country. I want to say, and I think the House will sustain the proposition, that inasmuch as we do pay our proportion of the taxes of the country we ought to have our proportion of the expenditures for the purpose of accommodating the public offices. I think the gentleman from Indiana, who opposes this or any other bill of a like character, should not take up the time of the House by having a response either on that or this side of the House, but that members should vote either for or against a proposition as it comes up, and appeal to the judgment and sense o f justice of members.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the bill was passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, LYNCHBURGH, VIRGINIA.

Mr. TUCKER. I move, Mr. Speaker, to suspend the rules and discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4199) for the erection of a public building at Lynchburgh, Virginia, and the same be passed.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan, moved that the House adjourn, and subsequently withdrew the motion.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the United States courts, post-office, and other Government offices at the city of Lynchburgh, Virginia. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $100,000: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than forty feet, including streets and alleys; and no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Virginia shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owners thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. Shall a second be considered as ordered? The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the reading of the report accompanying that bill.

Mr. TUCKER. Everybody knows this is an excellent case.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the reading of the report accompanying that bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1785) to provide for the erection of a public building for the use of the United States courts, post-office, and other Government offices at the city of Lynchburgh, in the State of Virginia, have duly considered the same, and submit the following report:

That Lynchburgh is one of the most growing and prosperous cities of Southwestern Virginia. It is the only place in the western district of Virginia where a circuit court of the United States is held. The docket is a very large one, the district embracing eleven counties. The house in which the courts are held is the only one obtainable, which is regarded by the judge and officers of the court as rickety and unsafe, and in other respects wholly unsuited and insufficient.

The amount of internal revenue collected for the year 1881 was $1,812,377.13.

The population, 15,000; and is the fourth city in the State of Virginia.

For these and many other good and sufficient reasons appearing among the papers submitted, of which, to avoid tedious detail, mention is omitted, your committee report the bill back with a substitute and recommend that the substitute do pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move the House adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 38, noes 63.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of the bill; and it was passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, PEORIA, ILLINOIS.

Mr. LEWIS. I move, Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent that the rules be suspended and the bill (S. No. 238) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Peoria, in the State of Illinois, be taken from the Speaker's table and passed with an amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to purchase a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with commodious fire-proof vaults, for the accommodation of the post-office, the United States courts, custom-house, bonded warehouse, internal-revenue offices, and other Government offices, at the city of Peoria, in the State of Illinois; which site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of at least fifty feet, including streets and alleys. The site, and the building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed the cost of $400,000: Provided, That no money to be appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site shall be vested in the United States, and the State of Illinois shall have ceded her jurisdiction over the same.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used and expended for the purpose provided in this act.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out $100,000 and insert in lieu thereof $225,000.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 179) for the construction of a public building at Peoria, Illinois, for the accommodation of the postal, internal-revenue, and other business of the United States transacted there, having considered the same, respectfully report:

That Peoria is a city of about thirty-five thousand inhabitants, situated on the Illinois River, and near the geographical center of the State of Illinois. Twelve railroads converge there, and others are in process of construction. It is in the midst of one of the most fertile and best improved tracts of country in that State, and has an unlimited supply of bituminous coal. In addition to the twelve converging railroads before mentioned, the city has the advantages for transportation furnished by the Illinois River and the Illinois Canal.

A large internal revenue is paid the Government at Peoria. From the year 1872 until 1882 the gross sum collected there was $76,545,902.85, and for the last half of the year 1881, $7,271,643.57. These figures show an average monthly collection of about $1,125,000, and a daily collection of about $400,000. This large business requires that about $2,000,000 worth of revenue stamps and a large amount of valuable papers and records be kept at Peoria. In the district in which this large internal-revenue business is conducted, the United States owns no building whatever. Buildings poorly adapted to the purpose, furnishing no proper protection from fire or theft, have been, and are now, occupied by the eighty internal revenue officers stationed at Peoria, involving an annual expenditure for rent of $——.

The net revenue received from the post-office at Peoria during the fiscal year 1879 was $24,569.66; in 1880, $33,104.18, and in 1881, $39,617.29. The building now occupied by the post-office is inconveniently located and poorly adapted to the transaction of the business and the accommodation of the public. The rent paid by the Government for said building is $1,500 per annum.

In view of the foregoing facts, your committee recommend the erection of a suitable Government building at said city of Peoria, and report back the bill by substitute and ask its passage, limiting the ultimate cost at the sum of $225,000.

Mr. BRAGG. Would it not save time to begin and call the Calendar. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is entitled to the floor in opposition to the bill, having demanded a second.

Mr. COX, of New York. Is this for another public building?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is.

Mr. COX, of New York. We are making our own graves by rushing through in this way these appropriations for public buildings.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. There was so much confusion during the reading of the bill that perhaps I misapprehended it; but if I understood it correctly it provides for a building for the accommodation, besides other offices, "of the United States courts."

Now, unless I misunderstood the debate which was participated in by the gentleman from Illinois, I am informed there are not any United States courts there.

Mr. HOLMAN. There are none.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Then I do not know why the bill should sail under false colors.

Mr. SPRINGER. If we are going to have United States courts in every village we may have one at Peoria after a while.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Why put it in this bill for the accommodation of United States courts at Peoria, Illinois, when there are no United States courts at Peoria, Illinois?

Mr. SPRINGER. Peoria has a population of 40,000. It manufactures more whisky than any city in the world.

Mr. CAMP. That settles it. They ought to have a United States court there. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I want to say a single word in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I have no doubt that the United States courts will be held there in time, but whether or not they are ever held there, this city of Peoria is the second city in size in my State, and $15,000,000 of internal-revenue taxes are collected every year, and have been for years past.

Mr. SPRINGER. Not quite that much, but about a million a month.

Mr. CANNON. Well, about that much in round numbers.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The city of Peoria pays more internal-revenue taxes than the whole State of Massachusetts, or in fact more than all the New England States combined, and more than the State of New York, including the city.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I merely want to meet that whisky argument which has been made by my friend upon the opposite side. It is always brought up here in support of such cases as this; and because a place produces a great deal of whisky we must understand, therefore, that it ought to be specially considered in such matters.

Mr. SPRINGER. They do not drink it all there.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Then I do not know that they contribute to the support of the Government.

I do not wish to be understood as opposing this special bill. But I want to call sharply to the attention of the House exactly what we are doing. I want them to know what we are about to do.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. We do understand it.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Gentlemen say they do understand it. Now, this bill proposes to put up a United States court-house in a place where, as we have been informed to-day, no United States court at all is held; and yet gentlemen say they know what they are doing. I want to know whether we are to put up public buildings of this character in places where there is occasion only for a post-office; and if so, the Committee on Public Buildings should state it. It may be in this case, and I do not wish to be understood as saying that it is not a case of necessity for a public building. I am not opposing this particular instance; but I do oppose any bill that under a false pretense is admitted to be put through this House. Let it show clearly what it is, and let us know what we are doing.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is no false pretense here.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I do not say positively that there is; but this bill proposes to erect a public building for the United States courts at a point where we were told to-day no United States courts are held, and yet gentlemen say there is no pretense, no sailing under false colors in the erection of a court-house and public building in this city.

Mr. SPRINGER. There are nearly one hundred persons employed there in Government business who have no offices except those that they rent, and they are unsuitable.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I do not pretend to take issue with the gentleman on that point. But why erect a court-house where no courts are held? If there is no need for a court-house, why are we called on to pass such a bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let me say a word right here.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Let me say my say first.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I only want to correct the gentleman.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Let me have my say first; it will only take a minute.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Undoubtedly, from the statement of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, there would seem to be occasion for this building. I do not take issue with gentlemen on that point; but it ought to be stated in the bill what the exact purpose is, and not have the House indorse something that is not a fact. That is all I want to say.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Now, I will say in response to the gentleman from Massachusetts, that there are eighty clerks employed there in the collection of internal revenue, and there is not a public building for that purpose in the city.

Mr. CAMP. Do not the internal-revenue officers pay their own rent?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. No, sir.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Not always.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to ask him if he expects this building to be erected before the internal-revenue tax on whisky is abolished?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The building is needed for many other purposes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I oppose all this system of legislating for the erecting public buildings. It is the old log-rolling steal over again, only done individually. We must draw the line somewhere——

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Do not draw the line on Illinois.

Mr. COX, of New York. I draw the line on you. [Laughter.] You say that there are eighty clerks actually employed in that city in this system of collecting whisky taxes. Now, I want to abolish that whole system of collecting taxes. It is worse than the tariff. The idea of erecting a public building in Peoria at a charge of several hundred thousand dollars for the collection of a whisky tax is not one that I can submit to. I oppose the whole business. Let us abolish this whisky business altogether.

Mr. MORRISON. And have no taxes at all? [Laughter.]

Mr. COX, of New York. No, sir; but cut down the administration of the Government to a frugal point, and not make raids upon the public Treasury for public buildings where there is no need for them.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I know my friend from New York does not want to misrepresent me.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am your friend, therefore do not interrupt me. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Illinois has stated that there are over eighty clerks employed there in collecting whisky taxes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I used that as an argument in favor of the bill. I repeat that the fact is Peoria pays more taxes into the national Treasury than the whole State of New York and even New England.

Mr. COX, of New York. But whoever drinks the whisky pays the tax, and the gentleman from Illinois knows it.

Mr. DUNNELL. Do not other gentlemen know it, too? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LEWIS.]

The question being taken, there were—ayes 101, noes 35.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LEWIS.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BRAGG. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 30.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let us vote down the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 47, nays 127, not voting 117, as follows:

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The following additional pairs were announced:
Mr. GIBSON with Mr. RICHARDSON of New York.
Mr. TAYLOR with Mr. TURNER of Georgia.
Mr. LORD with Mr. WISE of Pennsylvania.
Mr. MILLER with Mr. DAVIS of Missouri.
Mr. CRAPO with Mr. HEWITT of New York.
Mr. RICE, of Ohio, with Mr. GEDDES.
Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, with Mr. COBB.
Mr. BUCKNER with Mr. KASSON.
Mr. MCLANE with Mr. WADSWORTH.
Mr. FORNEY with Mr. WAIT.
Mr. HOUSE with Mr. PETTIBONE.
Mr. UPSON with Mr. CALKINS.

Mr. ROBESON. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. BRAGG. This is an important vote, and there may be some error in it. I think the names should be read.

The names of members voting were read, and the result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 98, noes 10.

Mr. BRAGG. I do not think so much money should be voted away with less than a quorum. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted, the Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG.]

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 131, noes 17.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] is recognized.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JONES, of Texas. I desire to move that the rules be suspended, that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3858) for the construction of a public building at Galveston, Texas, and that the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 58, noes 74.

Mr. BRAGG. I call for tellers.

On the question of ordering tellers there were—ayes 20; not one-fifth of a quorum.

So tellers were not ordered.

Mr. BRAGG. I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 22.

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair, a sufficient number have not voted to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. BRAGG. Count the other side.

The other side was counted; and there were noes 89.

So (the affirmative not being one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

On the question of ordering tellers, there were—ayes 19; not one-fifth of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. Tellers on the yeas and nays are refused, the yeas and nays are not ordered, tellers on the motion are refused, and the motion to adjourn is not agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT GALVESTON, TEXAS.

Mr. JONES, of Texas. I move to suspend the rules so as to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3858) to provide for the construction of a public building at Galveston, Texas, and that the same be passed at this time.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the custom-house, internal-revenue offices, and other Government offices, at the city of Galveston, in the State of Texas. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $125,000: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than forty feet, including streets and alleys; and no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Texas shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owners thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

Mr. BRAGG. I demand a second of the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. STEELE. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. That motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. STEELE. I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. BROWNE. I renew it.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 26, noes 63.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] to suspend the rules and pass the bill which has been read.

Mr. BRAGG. I demand a second of the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. Shall a second be considered as ordered?

Mr. BRAGG. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. A second is demanded, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] will take their places as tellers.

The House proceeded to divide, but before the tellers had completed their report,

Mr. BAYNE moved that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not now in order.

Mr. BAYNE. I call for a report from the tellers; abundant time has been given them.

The SPEAKER. The tellers have reported to the Chair, but have not completed their report.

Mr. BROWNE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWNE. When is it competent for the House to have a report of the vote by tellers?

The SPEAKER. When a quorum has voted the Chair will announce the result.

Mr. BROWNE. If no quorum is here——

The SPEAKER. The tellers have discharged their duty; they have reported to the Chair as fast as members have voted.

Mr. BROWNE. Suppose that no quorum appears; are we to be kept here all night?

Mr. WILSON. Nothing is in order now but a quorum, and I call the gentleman to order. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. There is evidently a quorum in the Hall, and gentlemen are requested to vote.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SINGLETON] moves a call of the House. Those in favor of the motion——

Mr. REED. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. REED. If it is not in order at this time to move an adjournment, it certainly is not in order to move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. One motion to adjourn, pending the motion to suspend the rules, has been made and voted down.

Mr. RANDALL. It requires a quorum to suspend the rules. Now we are without a quorum.

Mr. ROBESON. We do not know that.

Mr. RANDALL. The rules require that when a quorum does not appear a motion for a call of the House or a motion to adjourn shall be in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks a motion for a call of the House is in order.

Mr. RANDALL. The Constitution states that less than a quorum can adjourn from day to day. That is the condition of the House now. I submit that under existing circumstances, no quorum being present, a motion to adjourn is not in the nature of a dilatory motion at all.

The SPEAKER. The rules provide for that.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether, if the House should now adjourn, this motion would come up as unfinished business on the next day for individual motions to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would.

Mr. BAYNE. Very well; I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. BRAGG. I would not like to have the Chair decide in advance what he would rule when the question shall come up.

The SPEAKER. This motion would not come up until the class of business to which it is related comes up again.

Mr. BRAGG. No previous question has been ordered.

The SPEAKER. But it would be unfinished business like other unfinished business.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move that the House now take a recess.

The SPEAKER. The tellers have further reported. They report—ayes 137, noes 10; and the motion to suspend the rules is seconded.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not now in order.

Mr. SKINNER. I move that the House take a recess until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] to suspend the rules and pass the bill which has been read, which motion has just been seconded.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 120, noes 9.

Mr. BRAGG. No quorum has voted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is not now in order. The point having been made that no quorum has voted, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] will take their places as tellers upon the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill which has been read.

Mr. BRAGG. I would like to know why we cannot adjourn.

Mr. CANNON. I ask the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 130, nays 16, not voting 145; as follows:

Mr. SKINNER with Mr. RANDALL.

The SPEAKER. On this vote the yeas are 130, the nays 16. The Chair votes in the affirmative, making a quorum; and the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] to suspend the rules and pass the bill as read is agreed to.

Mr. ATHERTON. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. BRAGG. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRAGG. Did the Chair ask that the reading of the names be dispensed with, or were they read in full?

The SPEAKER. The reading was not dispensed with; they should be read.

Mr. BRAGG. I simply wanted to know why the Speaker proceeded to the next order of business before completing the preceding order.

The SPEAKER. The names will be read.

Mr. BRAGG. I have no objection to dispensing with the reading of the names. My objection was to the anxiety that an announcement should be irregularly made.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to dispensing with the reading of the names?

Mr. BRAGG. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection the reading of the names is dispensed with; and the result will stand as announced.

Mr. REED. I move that the House adjourn.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WARNER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

I present resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island, stating that they recognize the paramount importance of an intelligent ballot, and view with serious apprehension the growth and extension of the illiterate vote of the country, and recommending such legislation as will enable the States of the Union, in proportion to their illiterate population, to establish and maintain a sufficient number of schools for the education of youth. I move the reference of the resolutions to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY presented the petition of Lucy T. Stansell and other residents of Manistee, Michigan, praying for the passage of a law for the adoption of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution extending to women the right of suffrage; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

He also presented the memorial of Lucy T. Stansell and other residents of Michigan, protesting against the admission of Dakota into the Union as a State unless the right of suffrage therein be conferred upon women; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Bridget Adams, of Worcester, Massachusetts, praying for the removal of the charge of desertion against her husband, Daniel Adams, late a private in the Thirty-first Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, and that she be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. HARRISON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to ask leave of the Senate to sit during the sessions of the Senate. There are some matters pending before it which make the request necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana? The Chair hears none, and leave is granted.

CUSTOM-HOUSE LOT AT BERMUDA HUNDRED.

Mr. PLUMB. The Committee on Public Lands have had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4133) to authorize the sale of certain property at Bermuda Hundred, in the county of Chesterfield, in the State of Virginia, and have directed me to report it favorably, and to submit a report thereon. I believe I will ask for the immediate consideration of the bill. It has passed the House. It involves the sale of a half acre of ground only at Bermuda Hundred, which has been the property of the Government since 1790, and which has been rented during the time which has elapsed since then for merely a nominal rental. The Government has no use for the ground, as shown by the communications of the Government officials, and the bill ought to be disposed of now.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to sell, either at public or private sale and on such terms as he may deem best, a certain half-acre lot of unimproved land situated at Bermuda Hundred, in the county of Chesterfield, in the State of Virginia, and known as the "custom-house lot."

Mr. PLUMB. The report had better be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Acting Secretary read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4133) providing for the sale of a certain lot of ground located at Bermuda Hundred, Virginia, belonging to the Government, having considered the same, respectfully report:

That the property in question consists of a half-acre lot of unimproved ground belonging to the Government, located at Bermuda Hundred, Virginia, and commonly known in that vicinity as the custom-house lot, it having been deeded to the United States in April, 1790, and set apart for a site for the erection of a custom-house, which it was then supposed would be needed at or near that place. The Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, in a letter which is submitted herewith, reports that this property has not been occupied for any Government purpose for many years, and has been leased at a nominal rental of $1 per annum for some time. He also states that it appeared some years since that there was no probability of its ever being required for any Government use, and the supervising architect, in his annual report for 1875, recommended its sale. The present supervising architect makes a similar recommendation, and thinks it would be for the interest of the Government to sell the property, as there is no likelihood of its being required by the Government for any purpose. The property is desired for the terminus of a railroad, running from the coal mines in Chesterfield County, Virginia, and the committee think it would be for the interests of the Government to authorize the sale of the property, under proper restrictions, and they therefore report back the bill, and recommend its passage.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
February 3, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt by your reference of the 31st ultimo of a communication addressed under date of January 24, 1882, to the honorable G. D. Wise, of the House of Representatives, by James T. Werth, superintendent and treasurer of the Brighthope Railway Company of Richmond, Virginia, with reference to obtaining permission for the said company to occupy with its tracks a certain tract of land belonging to the United States, known as "the custom-house lot," located at Bermuda Hundred, Virginia.

In obedience to your instructions the following statement with reference to this property is respectfully submitted, namely:

The premises consist of one-half acre of unimproved land. The deed conveying the property to the United States bears date April 27, 1790, and as the grantee on behalf of the United States is the collector of the district of Bermuda Hundred, it is presumed that the property was acquired for customs purposes. It has not, however, been occupied for any Government use for many years, and has been leased at a nominal rental of $1 per annum for several years. It appeared some years since that there was no probability of its ever being required for any Government use, and Supervising Architect Potter, in his annual report for 1875, recommended its sale. The corporation making this application made a similar request in March, 1881, which was declined by Department letter dated April 11, 1881, for the reason that the permission asked "could not be granted without authority from Congress." This property is of little value, is of no use to the United States, and as there is no likelihood of its being required at any future time for Government purposes I am of the opinion that it would be in the interest of the Government to sell it, and to this end would suggest that you recommend to Congress the passage of an act authorizing its sale.

Very respectfully,

JAS. G. HILL,
Supervising Architect.

Hon. CHARLES J. FOLGER, Secretary of the Treasury.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 10, 1882.

DEAR SIR: Several weeks ago I introduced a bill for the sale of a half-acre lot of land at Bermuda Hundred, in the county of Chesterfield, in the State of Virginia. The owners of a railroad running from coal mines in Chesterfield County to the James River are very anxious to secure this lot, and in their interest I am anxious to have a report as early as possible. The lot was granted to the Government for a custom-house in the early days of the Republic, but has never been used for that or any other purpose, and never will be. The report from the Treasury Department accompanying my bill is full in explanation, and will convince the committee that it is in the interest of the Government to authorize the sale of the lot. As the railroad alluded to is used solely in connection with large mining operations, I respectfully request an early consideration and report upon my bill.

Very respectfully,

GEO. D. WISE.

Hon. WILLIAM S. SHALLENBERGER,
Chairman Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 4, 1882.

MY DEAR SIR: I hand you herewith a paper from one of the bureaus. I do not like to make suggestions for legislation save in an annual report, and so do not care to follow out the concluding recommendation in the paper. Yet it may, I think, aid you before a committee if you feel inclined to introduce a bill for the sale of the land.

Respectfully, &c.,

CHAS. J. FOLGER,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. G. D. WISE, M. C.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MORTON MONUMENTAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back to the Senate favorably, with amendments, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 96) granting condemned cannon to the Morton Monumental Association.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the consent of the Senate to pass the joint resolution at once.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the request will be granted. It is a House resolution, with slight amendments, and will have to go back to the House.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution which was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, in line 5, after the word "condemned," to insert "cast-iron," and in line 6, after the word "for," to strike out "casting;" so as to make the joint resolution read:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to give to the Morton Monumental Association of the United States twelve condemned cast-iron cannon and twenty-five cannon-balls for a statue of Oliver P. Morton, late a Senator from Indiana, to be erected at the city of Indianapolis, Indiana.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no objection to the passage of the joint resolution, but I think it would interest the Senate, in view of the extraordinary number of bills and resolutions which have been reported in this same direction during the present session, to know how many condemned cannon there are at the disposal of the Government, if the Senator from Missouri can inform me.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Missouri can state.

Mr. COCKRELL. I can give the exact information. The bronze cannon, it is estimated by the Secretary of War, have all been provided for; that is, appropriations have been made consuming all the condemned, obsolete, or useless bronze cannon.

Mr. INGALLS. They have all been donated for monumental purposes?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir; those which have not heretofore been used for other purposes. There are no brass cannon; there are fifty wrought-iron cannon, seven hundred and seventy-four cast-iron cannon, and forty-eight steel cannon. The bronze cannon are worth sixteen cents a pound, the cast-iron cannon are worth a cent and a quarter a pound, and they are utterly useless. The Government cannot use them by breaking them up or putting them in any shape. The wrought-iron and steel guns, of which there are fifty wrought-iron and forty-eight steel guns, are worth ten cents a pound. They can be to some extent utilized.

Mr. HARRIS. Are those all condemned?

Mr. COCKRELL. They are all useless, obsolete, or condemned cannon.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM J. POLLOCK.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the morning hour is declared closed.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider at this time the bill (S. No. 1549) for the relief of William J. Pollock. Mr. Pollock was formerly collector of internal revenue for one of the Pennsylvania districts, and has lately been reappointed. This bill is for his relief for the absence of certain special tax stamps which were stolen. The stamps are of no good to the finder and no loss to the Government, but they nevertheless affect the balance of his accounts, and as he is about to go into office again it is proper that the report, which was a unanimous one from the committee, should be approved by the Senate, and the bill for his relief passed.

I ask, therefore, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill. It will take but one moment. I think it will lead to no debate. The report in his favor is unanimous.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment, after the word "amount," in line 6, to insert "not exceeding the sum of $3,433.33;" so as to make the bill read:

That the accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized, in settling the accounts of William J. Pollock, late collector of internal revenue for the second district of Pennsylvania, to credit said Pollock with the amount, not exceeding the sum of $3,433.33, of the unused coupons attached to the stubs of special-tax stamps deposited by him in the post-office at Philadelphia, February 12, 1875, but lost in transmission to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in the city of Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSION BILLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first case on the Calendar will be called.

Mr. PLATT. If it is in order, I should like to ask the Senate to consider the pension cases on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in order. The Senator can move that before proceeding with the consideration of the Calendar under the Anthony rule the pension cases shall be taken up.

Mr. PLATT. There are perhaps fifteen pension bills on the Calendar which have been reported favorably from the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS. Including those reported this morning?

Mr. PLATT. Not including those, but those previously reported.

Mr. INGALLS. Why not consider all of them?

Mr. PLATT. I move to take them up at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of pension bills reported favorably.

Mr. INGALLS. Including those reported this morning?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the consent of the Senate will be regarded as having been given. The first pension case on the Calendar will be called.

EMMA H. COLLINS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 984) increasing the pension of Emma H. Collins.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty" and insert "forty;" so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Emma H. Collins, widow of Frederick Collins, late a lieutenant in the United States Navy, a pension at the rate of $40 a month during her widowhood, and from the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senator from Connecticut, the acting chairman of the committee, if $40 a month is the amount regularly allowed in such cases?

Mr. PLATT. It is not.

Mr. COCKRELL. What are the reasons for fixing a different amount?

Mr. PLATT. The amount allowed by law would I think be $20. Lieutenant Collins was a lieutenant in the Navy, and the rate of pension for a lieutenant in the Navy is the same I think as that of captain in the Army, which is $30. Perhaps the report in this case had better be read, when it will be seen on what grounds the committee recommended an increase.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. VAN WYCK March 28:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 984) granting an increase of pension to Emma H. Collins, having carefully considered the same, make the following report:

That Emma H. Collins is the widow of the late Lieutenant Frederick Collins, of the Navy; that the said Lieutenant Collins entered the Navy July 24, 1863, and served continuously until the date of his death, which occurred at the city of Washington, D. C., on the 27th day of October, 1881; that death resulted from remittent fever, which originated in the service of the United States; and that the said Emma H. Collins received a pension of $25, commencing November 5, 1881.

The services of Lieutenant Collins are shown to have been of a highly scientific and brilliant character. In January, 1870, Lieutenant Collins joined the first of the expeditions for the survey of the Isthmus of Panama, and upon his arrival at the Isthmus Lieutenant Collins was transferred from the duty of guarding the working parties, stores, &c., to the different labors of the scientific corps, which accompanied the expedition. On the 14th of July, 1870, Lieutenant Collins was detached from the Darien survey and placed on waiting orders. More extensive surveys of the Isthmus in search of a practical canal route being contemplated, Lieutenant Collins was ordered to report to Captain Shufeldt for duty with the Tehuantepec Canal survey on the 20th September, 1870. At this time he was suffering with isthmus fever, and unable to report for duty, but a month later he was ordered to San Francisco on duty connected with the second Darien Canal expedition; thence he proceeded to Panama in January, 1871. He was given in charge of an important branch of the survey; his work in connection with this field of labor was, in point of ability, of a character above his rank. Lieutenant Collins then returned to Washington to assist in the preparation of the report of the surveys for publication.

On February 20, 1872, he was ordered to prepare the wind and current chart of the Pacific, which subsequently had so great an influence in deciding the question as to the merits of the various canal routes. In December, 1872, he was again ordered to the survey of the Isthmus, ranking as second in command of the expedition, and was ordered to assume command on account of the illness of his superior officer, who was delayed in joining in the work. At this time the said Collins was but twenty-five years old, and his ability and zeal were well illustrated by the character of his work.

After some time he returned to Washington and engaged himself in the preparation of data, &c., for a complete report of his labors. He was for a brief period employed as an instructor at the Naval Academy at Annapolis, but in November, 1874, he was ordered to command the fourth expedition to Darien, where he began and completed the most exhaustive survey of the Napipi route. After this he served some time in the Hydrographic Office. In December, 1876, he commanded the expedition to prepare the coast pilot and sailing directions for the Atlantic coast of the United States south of Cape Henry. This duty occupied his time, with the exception of some time spent on work on Chesapeake Bay, until July, 1879, when he was obliged to relinquish the command of this work on account of isthmus fever recurring. He afterward returned to this work and completed it.

His last work was as a member of the Naval advisory board, being engaged on that board at the time of his death.

During all this work the said Collins was frequently prostrated by isthmus fever, contracted in the early part of his labor at Darien, and from which he never recovered, and which ultimately caused his death.

The character of the attainments of Lieutenant Collins are vouched for by Admiral Porter, Rear-Admirals Rodgers, Worden, Howell, and Ammen, and many other high officials of the Navy.

Your committee are of the opinion that in view of the distinguished services of Lieutenant Collins his widow should be granted an increase of pension, and therefore report bill S. No. 984 with the following amendment, viz: Strike out the word "fifty," in line 6, immediately following the words "at the rate of," and insert in lieu thereof the word "forty."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALLY HALL.

The bill (H. R. No. 4344) granting a pension to Sally Hall was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It places on the pension-roll the name of Sally Hall, of South New Market, New Hampshire, widow of Andrew Hall, late a private in Captain Hersey's company of New Hampshire militia in the war of 1812, to take effect from the time of the filing of her application for a pension.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVID G. HUTCHINSON.

The bill (H. R. No. 638) granting a pension to David G. Hutchinson, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll the name of David G. Hutchinson, of Lincoln, Maine, dependent father of William H. Hutchinson, late a corporal of Company E, Seventeenth United States Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELIZABETH FULKS.

The bill (H. R. No. 1579) granting a pension to Elizabeth Fulks, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It places on the pension-roll the name of Elizabeth Fulks, widow of Elcanah Fulks, deceased, late a private in Company A, Ninth Regiment Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CECIL CLAY.

The bill (H. R. No. 5381) granting an increase of pension to Cecil Clay, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

ANDROS GUILLE.

The bill (H. R. No. 1340) granting an increase of pension to Andros Guille was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the pension of Andros Guille, late a corporal of Company K, Ninety-seventh Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, of $18 per month, for an injury to his hand, be increased to $30 per month by reason of an additional wound received in the line of duty, at the battle of Missionary Ridge, from a bursting shell, which carried away his entire nose, upper lip and teeth, and part of his upper jawbone; and that the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place his name on the pension roll at said increased rate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senate will not concur in the amendment of the committee. The condition of this soldier is of the most wretched character. He has a wife and eight children, and his face was shot off by a shell; so that he is an object of pity to all the people in his town. I have been written to in his behalf by several leading citizens there who had noticed the reduction of the pension proposed by our committee. I hope the Senate will allow the bill to stand at the rate fixed by the House, which is low enough.

Mr. PLATT. Let the report be read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. GROOME April 25:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1340) granting an increase of pension to Andros Guille, have considered the same, and report:

That Andros Guille was a corporal in Company A, Ninety-seventh Ohio Volunteers, and that on November 25, 1863, at the battle of Missionary Ridge, he was wounded by the bursting of a shell, which shattered the bones of his left hand, and rendered it permanently and almost entirely disabled, and carried away his nose, upper lip, a number of his front teeth, and a part of his upper jawbone. These wounds in the face not only very greatly disfigure him, and render it necessary for him to wear an artificial nose, upper lip, and mustache, as is shown by an ample amount of testimony, but, according to his statement, they very greatly inconvenience him in eating and drinking, and render him unable to speak distinctly, as it seems probable they would. In addition to the wounds already mentioned, Guille was seriously wounded in the right shoulder by a piece of the shell.

The said Guille is now receiving a pension of $18 a month, which the bill referred to your committee proposes, in view of the number and very serious character of the wounds from which he is suffering, and in view of his great personal disfigurement, to increase to $50 a month.

Your committee are of the opinion that Andros Guille, upon the case presented, should be allowed an increase of pension; but not to the extent proposed by the bill passed by the House. They therefore recommend that the bill referred to them be amended by striking out the word "fifty," in line 6, and inserting in place thereof "thirty;" and as so amended they recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. PLATT. If I correctly recollect this case, the committee of the House reported in favor of increasing this pension to $36, and the House in its generosity or enthusiasm, whichever you may please to call it, made it $50. It seems to me that this pension ought not to be $50. I do not know that I would object to $36. There was some difference in our committee as between $36 and $30; but I think perhaps the committee would assent to $36, at least a majority of them; but $50 is all that a man gets to-day by general law if he is paralyzed in both legs and both arms and cannot move or feed himself, or dress himself, and requires the constant and regular aid and attendance of another person. Now to take this case and make the pension the same that the law allows for a person utterly and totally helpless, so as to require the personal aid and assistance of another person, did not seem right to the committee. I am aware that the fact that he has been so disfigured in his face appeals to the sympathy of Senators, but at the same time the committee felt that there must be justice as between different pensioners of the same degree of disability, and that it was not fair to take a person of a less disability and give him the same pension which the law provides for a person sustaining a far greater disability.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on amendment of the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLATT. I move that the bill be amended by inserting "thirty-six" in place of "fifty." That is an amendment which I think the committee would recommend at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 14.

Mr. PLATT. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the yeas and nays are to be called I simply wish to read a paragraph from a letter I have received from a gentleman of standing. I am sure if Senators could see this man in his condition as described to me they would rather lose both legs and both arms and be entirely helpless provided they had the ability to eat and drink and live. This man's face was shot off largely; his nose was taken and his upper jaw. He has to live on liquids and be fed, both arms being partially disabled and paralyzed. It seems to me a more helpless position cannot be imagined. He is a man of very high standing, who was wounded in the service. He has a wife and eight children, and I am appealed to by gentlemen of the highest standing whom I know in Zanesville, Ohio, in his behalf.

I trust the Senate will do as the House did, construe this matter liberally, and give him a pension for total disability, for he is not only totally disabled, but he is a wreck. A leading lawyer writes to me:

If the committee could realize the disfigurement and other disability they would not refuse him the increase allowed by the House.

Again he says:

Allow me to make this second appeal for him as an earnest one.

I trust the Senate will allow the $50.

Mr. GROOME. Mr. President, I examined this case carefully and drew the report. It is a most aggravated case so far as personal disfigurement is concerned, but the Pension Bureau, acting under the general law, after considering all the man's disabilities, allowed him a pension of but $18 a month. The committee of the Senate in view not only of the disabilities, but of the personal disfigurement and the mortification incident thereto, determined that it was proper that a higher rate of pension should be granted, and by a divided committee, the committee being divided between $36 and $30 a month, they reported in favor of $30 a month. Upon further consideration to-day the majority of the committee have determined that they will not oppose $36 a month, if the Senator from Ohio will be satisfied with that rate. That was the amount agreed upon by the House committee.

While I have the utmost possible sympathy for this man, or for any man in his unfortunate situation, I feel that in this matter of pensions we must be governed by some general rule. It will not do to give way to sympathy, no matter how aggravated may be the injury. Under the general law a man who has lost both arms or both legs, or who is totally blind, or who is otherwise totally disabled, and requires the constant care and attention of another person, is only entitled to $72 a month. I think when Congress give to this man, in view of his personal disfigurement, one-half of that rate per month, they are dealing by him with very considerable liberality.

I hope, therefore, that the provision to make this pension $50 a month will not prevail, but that the Senate will be governed by the opinion not only of its own committee but of the committee of the House of Representatives, that the rate ought not to be higher than $36 a month, for which latter rate I propose to vote.

Mr. PENDLETON. I simply desire to say that this is one of the most extraordinary cases of disfigurement I have ever heard of. A great part of the man's whole face was carried away by a shell; his mouth, nose, lip, and the upper part of his face are gone. Death would have been a blessing to him; he cannot get employment because his face is so terrible to look at; he cannot pass along the streets without boys jeering at him; he is in a more terrible condition than, as my colleague has said, if he had lost both arms and legs. He is a perpetual mortification to himself, a perpetual distress to his wife and family.

I hope the Senate will concur with the House in giving him a pension of $50 a month.

Mr. MAXEY. I listened to the report in this case with a great deal of care. I have had some observation of wounds, and I do not believe that in all my life I have ever heard of any man wounded who was so thoroughly disfigured as this man was. It is stated by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] that he is so fearfully disfigured that he cannot even get employment. It is stated by the Senator from Ohio across the way [Mr. SHERMAN] that he had to have a false nose, a false lip, and wear a moustache to hide as far as possible this great disfigurement. Every one can see how a man must suffer in feeling by being regarded by the whole community as an object of abhorrence.

It seems to me that the action of the House is right. While I am as much in favor of a reasonable and proper guard upon pensions as any gentleman, this is one of those cases that meet my sympathy, and I shall vote with the House for the $50 a month, believing it to be right.

Mr. PLATT. I called for the yeas and nays, but since this matter has been discussed and the Senate has given its attention, I presume the vote will be sufficiently full to disclose a quorum, and if so I do not insist on the call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call for the yeas and nays is withdrawn. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut to the amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS. I was unfortunately out of the Chamber when this matter was discussed, and do not exactly understand its attitude. I understand that the House passed a bill giving this man $50 a month. I should like to vote to sustain the House bill, and I desire to be advised now as to what my vote should be on the amendment pending.

Mr. SHERMAN. Vote against all amendments.

Mr. INGALLS. Very well.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected, there being on a division—ayes 17, noes 30.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Pensions to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty."

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALLY C. MULLIGAN.

The bill (H. R. No. 3390) granting a pension to Sally C. Mulligan was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It places on the pension-roll the name of Sally C. Mulligan, mother of James S. Mulligan, late first lieutenant of Company I of the Twenty-first Regiment New York Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANCIS REICHERT.

The bill (H. R. No. 1239) granting a pension to Francis Reichert was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Francis Reichert, late of Company I, Fifth Missouri Volunteers, and Company K, Fourteenth Illinois Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARGARET BEYMER.

The bill (S. No. 604) granting a pension to Margaret Beymer was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll the name of Margaret Beymer, widow of Elias J. Beymer, late lieutenant and adjutant of the One hundred and thirty-sixth Illinois Volunteers, and acting deputy provost-marshal of the eleventh Congressional district in the State of Illinois.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment to add "and pay her a pension at the rate of $17 a month."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSION BILLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pension bills reported this morning will now be taken up, those on the Calendar having been disposed of.

Mr. PLATT. I hardly think it necessary or advisable to take up the bills reported this morning, and I think it is a bad practice. It will only make a day or two's difference, I presume, in the time they will be passed, as I have no doubt the Senate will permit them to be taken up immediately after the printing of the reports. I do not insist on this, but I rather prefer the bills reported to-day should not be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will not be called.

MISSISSIPPI JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] was called home some two weeks since on account of sickness in his family. He had reported, before he left, a bill from the Judiciary Committee in which he felt a very great interest, and he addressed me a letter asking to have the Senate act on the bill at as early a time as possible. It is Senate bill No. 1168, in relation to courts in the State of Mississippi. It was unanimously reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. The Senator from Mississippi has not troubled the Senate at this session at all, and he now requests the Senate to consider the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1168) to amend the several acts in relation to the division of the State of Mississippi into judicial districts, and further to amend the several acts in relation to the northern judicial district of the State of Mississippi, and to provide for the times and places of holding the United States district courts in said northern district.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 6, line 2, after the word "bankruptcy," to strike out "and all criminal and other prosecutions;" so as to read:

That all causes and proceedings in law, equity, or bankruptcy now pending in the district court of the northern district of Mississippi, where all the defendants (or the plaintiffs, where the jurisdiction is derived from the residence of the plaintiffs within the district) shall reside in the eastern division of said district, shall be transferred to the court of such eastern division of said northern district.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask if this bill is reported from the Committee on the Judiciary?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was reported unanimously by the Committee on the Judiciary. It was reported by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. SHERMAN. All right; I have no objection, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is simply in relation to the times of the terms of the courts.

Mr. GARLAND. It is upon the plan of the Kentucky court bill and two or three others we have established.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does it establish a new judge?

Mr. GARLAND. Oh, no.

Mr. SHERMAN. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a similar bill to one proposed for the court at Toledo, Ohio.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was, at the end of section 7, to add:

All prosecutions for crimes and offenses heretofore committed shall be commenced and prosecuted as if this act had not passed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, line 1, before the word "causes," to insert "civil;" in the same line, after the word "causes," to strike out "civil or criminal;" in line 6, before the word "causes," to insert "civil," and after the word "causes" to strike out "civil or criminal;" so as to read:

SEC. 8. That all civil causes now pending in the United States court for the southern district of Mississippi against parties residing in that part of the Territory of said southern district by this act annexed to and incorporated in the aforesaid northern judicial district, and that all civil causes now pending in the United States court for the northern district of Mississippi against parties residing in that part of the territory of said northern district by this act annexed to and incorporated in the aforesaid southern judicial district, may remain and be finally disposed of, respectively, in the courts in which they are now pending.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 11, in the following words:

SEC. 11. That the said district judge of the United States for the State of Mississippi and the district attorney for said northern judicial district of the State of Mississippi shall receive, in addition to the sums already allowed them by law, for their extra compensation under this act, the former the sum of $1,500 per annum and the latter the sum of $100 per annum, to be paid in the manner heretofore provided for the payment of said salaries.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to say that I think the bill ought to pass as a measure of relief to the people of the district, to whom it will be a great convenience.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DR. A. SIDNEY TEBBS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first case on the Calendar in regular order will be stated.

The consideration of the bill (S. No. 296) for the relief of Dr. A. Sidney Tebbs was resumed as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. EDMUNDS to refer the bill and amendment to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PLUMB. I voted in committee for this bill in its original shape, which was to waive the statute so far as it concerned the individual named, Dr. Tebbs; I think I should have been willing to vote for the bill in its present shape, desirous as I have been that all the restrictions and differences which have existed growing out of the late war might be taken out of the way so far as the law was concerned; but some of the utterances in this debate have led me to conclude that, on the whole, it is just as well to wait. I think perhaps the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMPTON,] who expressed doubt the other day as to which side was right, may gain something by a little delay; he may ascertain more certainly after a while which side was right.

Possibly he may have some of his constituents in the same frame of mind. In view of the utterances made by that Senator and by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] on this subject, and for the purpose of getting a better view of the situation as it is to-day among the constituents of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber, I think it is just as well that this matter should go over; not go to the Judiciary Committee for the purpose of any investigation as to the propriety of it, but simply to lie there and wait. That will develop public sentiment which shall enable the persons who are to come here to represent the different States in this assembly of States to determine precisely what their view is about the merits of that trouble. I shall vote to refer the bill.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs I approved the action of the committee, and expressed that approval in a few words addressed to the Senate the other day. I have studied the matter over since, and if I had had the slightest idea that gentlemen from other portions of the Union than that where I live would oppose a measure of this kind I should not have proposed to offer such a bill as that reported by the committee.

I believed it to be a bill in the interest of peace. I believed it to be burying in the dead past a statute which kept in perpetual memory the troubles which had taken place between the North and the South. I believed that all history stood in favor of the action of the committee, and I took the trouble, for I remembered something about it, to look back at the record to see what had been done.

I found a bill introduced on the 2d of December, 1872, by Mr. Charles Sumner, whose ability no one will question, in my judgment the ablest man whom New England has sent to the Senate of the United States since the days of Mr. Webster, from whom I differed as widely as I did from any man living in politics, yet I find sagacious statesmanship, learning, ability, and kindliness of heart displayed in the bill to which I refer, and I think it would be well now to look at it. It is entitled "A bill to regulate the Army Register and the regimental colors of the United States," and proceeds:

Whereas the national unity and good-will among fellow-citizens can be assured only through oblivion of past differences, and it is contrary to the usage of civilized nations to perpetuate the memory of civil war: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the names of battles with fellow-citizens shall not be continued in the Army Register, or placed on the regimental colors of the United States.

The spirit which underlay this bill is the precise spirit which underlies this report of the Committee on Military Affairs. For that expression of Mr. Sumner he was arraigned by the Legislature of his State, and on the 9th of January, 1873, there were laid on the table of the Senate resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts, which recited that—

Whereas a bill has been introduced in the Senate of the United States by a Senator from Massachusetts—

Name not given—

providing "that the names of battles with fellow-citizens shall not be continued in the Army Register or placed on regimental colors of the United States;" and

Whereas the passage of such a bill would be an insult to the loyal soldiery of the nation and depreciate their grand achievements in the late rebellion: Therefore,

Resolved, That such legislation meets the unqualified condemnation of the people of this Commonwealth.

Resolved, That the governor be requested to forward to our Senators and Representatives in Congress copies of these resolutions.

Here was a resolution passed in the midst of excitement by the Legislature of Massachusetts, condemning one of the ablest and, in my judgment, one of the purest men that that State ever had as her representative on the floor of the Senate Chamber of the United States; but time passed by, and it was found that that Legislature in that action did not represent the true sentiment of the State of Massachusetts; that it was done inconsiderately, and the Legislature, to its honor be it said, and to the honor of the State be it said, at a subsequent time passed a resolution rescinding the one which I have just read. I find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 2, part 3, Forty-third Congress, first session, March 10, 1874, the resolution of that Legislature, laid before the Senate by Mr. Boutwell, to this effect:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives in general court assembled, That the resolution passed on the 18th day of December, 1872, at the extra session of the Legislature of that year, relating to a bill introduced in the Senate of the United States concerning the Army Register and regimental colors of the United States, be, and hereby is, rescinded and annulled.

It was an honorable act on the part of the State of Massachusetts to rescind that resolution of condemnation against one of her ablest Senators, who was guided and actuated not, as any one can see, through a spirit of demagogy, but through a spirit of broad and enlightened and sagacious statesmanship, and who did utter there two truths of the utmost moment and magnitude:

Whereas the national unity and good-will among fellow-citizens can be assured only through oblivion of past differences.

That is a grand truth that we should all take home to us, and it was one of those great truths which he gave as the reason for the introduction of his bill; and the other is:

And it is contrary to the usage of civilized nations to perpetuate the memory of civil war.

It only needs a knowledge of history to show that that is literally true.

I find further that was not introduced in a spirit of mere emulation. When he introduced that bill he gave notice that he would deliver a speech giving his reason in full for it; but the condition of his health prevented that he should carry out that intention, though we have at a later period his reasons given. I find in the "Life of Charles Sumner" this in writing to a friend, and the autograph letter is here to show that it is not a mistake. He says, writing to that friend: "Never was I more sure of any proposition than that for which I am assailed. When well enough I will place it beyond all question, showing reason, history, and every civilized nation for it. The Emperor of Germany has just adopted it."

This bill, as I believe, carries out that great idea of Charles Sumner. It is ten years since he introduced that bill. There was for a time a spirit of excitement and indignation, but that happily died away, and his own State recognized it by the rescinding of the resolution of censure against him for the introduction of the bill. Ten years have passed by since that time, and the whole country is trying to get together. So far as I know, so far as I can judge from the general spirit of the people, as evinced by the press, in the pulpit, upon the stump, in the two Houses of Congress, everywhere, a disposition is manifesting itself that there should be an oblivion of the past, and that from this point on we should go forth not only a Union in name but a Union in fact, a Union in spirit and in truth, all of us united together under a common flag and having a common destiny, and all marching to the grand and glorious perfection of what our forefathers started, the sublimest Union of free and independent States that the world ever saw.

Everything that is done which retards that is against the highest and best principles of statesmanship. The spirit which underlies the bill of Mr. Sumner is patriotic, sagacious statesmanship, and it evidences a perfect and thorough knowledge of the history of all ages past and present, and the action of all times and countries in measures following a great civil war.

It was with these views that this bill was introduced, so far as I know. If there was any objection in committee I did not hear it. I believed it to be wise, I believed it to be just. If this statute was passed, as it was, at a time when there was a reason for it, the reason for the law, which was temporary in its nature, having failed, the law should fail with the reason. The time for it has passed by. It was but a temporary law made for a temporary purpose, and that purpose has long since been subserved, and there is now no need for perpetuating it as a monument on the statute-book. Everything of that kind is against the best interests of the country; in the language of Mr. Sumner, "National unity and good-will among fellow-citizens can be assured only through oblivion of past differences," and it is equally true that "it is contrary to the usage of civilized nations to perpetuate the memory of civil war."

Having that view, actuated by what I believe to be pure motives, having no earthly interest in this matter whether it succeed or fail, having no kith or kin to go into the Army, having especial concern for only two boys in the world, and neither of them will ever go into the Army except their country calls them in time of war, certainly never in peace, I supported this bill because it is right, because I believed that the better spirit of brotherhood has dominated the spirit of passion, and that the time has come when we could all meet and by a unanimous vote repeal a statute passed for a purpose, which purpose has seventeen years ago been accomplished.

Mr. HAMPTON. Mr. President, I confess to very great surprise at the remarks of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] just made, for I think he has placed an entirely wrong construction upon the few words I said the other day. I expressed no opinion as to who was right or who was wrong, which side was right or which was wrong in the late war. It was expressly to disclaim anything of that sort that I rose. I said that, unlike the Senator from Vermont, I did not arrogate to myself the infallibility of pronuncing upon a very grave question. I certainly said nothing that would indicate that I presumed to express any opinion upon that point.

The Senator from Kansas, in what he says, seems to agree with the opinion of Napoleon that Providence always fights on the side of the heaviest battalions. Now, sir, no great question of right was ever settled in the world, and none ever will be settled as long as the world lasts, by the sword. I put that question entirely behind me. I simply said that my convictions were as honest and sincere as those of the Senator from Vermont, and I repeat now that they were as sincere and honest as those of the Senator from Kansas. I have not impunged his patriotism, his integrity, or his sincerity, and I trust nothing that I said the other day had a tendency to rouse sectional animosity or to rekindle the fires which are so happily dying out.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Kansas I would say that neither here nor elsewhere has he ever heard or have I ever heard any discussion upon the rightfulness of the war on the part of the national Government; that question has never been raised nor discussed. I have never heard any one deny that every government has the right and that it is its duty to preserve its territorial integrity and its political autonomy. The Senator from Kansas cannot predicate his objection to the repeal of this law upon anything that I have said, for I go as far, and the argument goes as far, and every man here goes as far, as any upon that side in admitting the national authority to preserve the national life. But the rightfulness of, the conduct of, individuals has been the subject of discussion here; the question whether men who were taught by the example of our fathers and taught by the example and the public teachings of many eminent men had some warrant for the opinions which they entertained, and whether it is right or wrong for a man to follow the honest and conscientious belief which he has formed. That is the question which the Senator from Kansas must answer and which has been in discussion here, whether a perpetual stigma is to be attached to men who simply did what others before them had done and what they believed was right. I agree that the national Government in the war had a right to preserve the national life, the right to enforce its authority, to preserve its political integrity, as every other government has. Every one that I have heard discuss the subject, in this Chamber or out, believes the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the reference of the bill, with the amendment, to the Committee on the Judiciary, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Acting Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] If he were here, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. RANSOM, (when Mr. LOGAN'S name was called.) On this question the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] is paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.]

Mr. MILLER, of New York, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GROOME] on political questions.

Mr. ROLLINS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES,] but I have transferred the pair to the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE,] and will vote myself, having reserved that right. I vote "yea."

Mr. WINDOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN.]

Mr. FRYE. On this question I am afraid I am obliged to recognize my pair with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] and therefore shall not vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of two o'clock has arrived, and the Chair must lay before the Senate its unfinished business. He will, before doing so, however, ask leave to present certain House bills that they may be referred.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

A bill (H. R. No. 3858) to provide for the construction of a public building at Galveston, Texas;

A bill (H. R. No. 4177) for the erection of a public building at Council Bluffs, Iowa;

A bill (H. R. No. 4199) for the erection of a public building at Lynchburgh, Virginia;

A bill (H. R. No. 4701) to provide for the erection of a public building at Detroit, Michigan;

A bill (H. R. No. 5546) for the erection of a public building at Greensborough, North Carolina; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5575) providing for a public building at Jackson, Tennessee.

The bill (H. R. No. 4166) to divide the State of Iowa into two judicial districts was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT QUINCY, ILLINOIS.

The bill (H. R. No. 4176) for the erection of a public building at Quincy, Illinois, was read twice by its title.

Mr. VEST. This is in the language of a bill that was reported by me from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in the Senate, and it is the identical bill which has already been reported to the Senate, and is on the Calendar. I ask for its present consideration.

The bill was, by unanimous consent, considered as in Committee of the Whole, reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate bill on the same subject, being the bill (S. No. 239) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Quincy, in the State of Illinois, will be indefinitely postponed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PEORIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. No. 238) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Peoria, in the State of Illinois, returned with an amendment from the House. The Senate passed the bill, providing that $400,000 should be the cost of the erection of this building. It has been amended in the House by inserting $225,000 instead of $400,000. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] asks that the amendment be now concurred in.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was, in line 11, to strike out "four hundred" and insert "two hundred and twenty-five."

The amendment was concurred in.

MIAMI INDIAN LANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 328) to provide for the sale of the lands of the Miami Indians in Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the bill and amendments be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs for further consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

INTEROCEANIC ISTHMIAN COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Navy communicating, in compliance with the resolution of the 17th of March last, such information as has been collected by the Bureau of Navigation relating to the problem of interoceanic communication by the American Isthmus.

Mr. WINDOM. I suggest that as both the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Committee on Commerce have reported on that subject, the communication lie on the table and be printed. I make that motion. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the documents are quite voluminous, but they are important.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks they ought to go to a committee.

Mr. WINDOM. Let the motion to print be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to print will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

NAVIGABLE WATERS OF UPPER COLUMBIA.

Mr. SLATER submitted the following concurrent resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House concurring,) That 10,000 copies of the report of Lieutenant T. W. Symons, Corps of Engineers, respecting the navigable waters of the Upper Columbia River and its tributaries, and resources of the country adjacent thereto, be printed, 1,000 for the use of the War Department, 3,000 for the use of the Senate, and 6,000 for the use of the House.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 1st instant, approved and signed the act (S. No. 1598) to authorize the Secretary of War to donate to the Ladies' Soldiers' Monument Society of Portsmouth, Ohio, four condemned cannon.

The message also announced that the bill (S. No. 185) for the relief of the captain, owners, officers, and crew of the late United States private-armed brig General Armstrong, their heirs, executors, administrators, agents, or assigns, having been received by the President on April 20, and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which it originated within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, has become a law without his approval.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 880) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Hannibal, in the State of Missouri; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 420) to establish a court of appeals.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the Committee on the Judiciary will be read.

Mr. MORGAN. Before the amendments of the Committee on the Judiciary are read I desire to submit some observations upon this bill.

At the proper time, in the course of proceedings on this bill, I intend to offer a substitute.

Mr. INGALLS. I hope the Senator will give us the benefit of his reflections now so that we may consider it.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I intend to send it to the desk and ask that it be read as part of my remarks, prefacing, however, that I am not the author of this proposition, which was drawn up by a member of the bar of Washington City, Mr. Maury, who I think is a very able lawyer, who has bestowed close attention for a long time to this subject. I prefer his arrangement of this court of federal appeals, as he terms it, to that contained in this bill for sundry reasons, which I will state after the substitute has been read.

The general theory of Mr. Maury's bill, as I may call it, which I have the honor to offer as a substitute, and all the bills now pending before the Senate is very much the same. The difference relates to the number of judges to be appointed and the distribution of the district judges in this court of federal appeal; and in fact this bill requires less machinery than that of the committee. I do not commit myself as to all its details; but I present it at this time and ask that it be read in order that the Senate may be possessed of the proposition. Probably there are other plans which can be submitted that have not yet been laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That henceforth the Supreme Court of the United States shall hold its sessions annually on the second Monday in October and February, and shall have jurisdiction to review and re-examine, by writ of error or on appeal, the final judgments and decrees of the circuit and district courts of the United States, the supreme courts of the Territories, and the supreme court of the District of Columbia, in all civil cases involving questions arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, or the laws of nations, the determination of which shall be necessary to the decision of such cases, in all civil cases where the United States or any officer thereof suing under the authority of any act of Congress are plaintiffs, and in all other cases in which the amount or thing in controversy is of the sum or value of $15,000 or upward, exclusive of interest and cost; and the said jurisdiction shall be exercised in accordance with the laws now in force, except in so far as the same may be incompatible with this act; and shall have jurisdiction to review, by writ of error, the judgments of the said courts in criminal cases, under the limitations hereinafter prescribed.

SEC. 2. That a court is hereby established to be known as the court of federal appeals, to be composed of two divisions, to be designated respectively the first and second divisions; and there shall be appointed for each of the said divisions a presiding judge and four associate judges.

SEC. 3. That the said court shall hold its sessions at the seat of government annually on the second Monday in October and February, and shall have jurisdiction to review and re-examine, by writ of error and on appeal, the final judgments and decrees of the circuit and district courts of the United States, the supreme courts of the Territories, and the supreme court of the District of Columbia in all cases in which the amount or thing in controversy shall be greater than the sum or value of $1,000, exclusive of interest and costs, and less than the sum or value of $15,000, exclusive of interest and costs, and not necessarily involving questions arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, or the law of nations, and in which the United States or any officer thereof suing under an act of Congress are not plaintiffs; and shall have jurisdiction to review, by writ of error, the judgments of the said courts in criminal cases, under the limitations hereinafter prescribed. And each divison of the said court shall hear and determine such cases as may be allotted to it from time to time by the presiding judges of the said divisions, who in making such allotments shall not allot to either division a case in which a judge of such division had sat in the circuit court; and the judgments and decrees of the said divisions, respectively, shall be entered as the judgments and decrees of the court of federal appeals. And the jurisdiction in civil cases hereby vested in the court of federal appeals shall be exercised in accordance with the laws now in force regulating writs of error from and appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States, except in so far as the said laws may be inconsistent with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. That the defendant in a criminal case deeming himself aggrieved by any ruling of the court on the trial thereof may except to such ruling and tender his bill of exceptions, which shall be settled and allowed according to the truth, and signed by the judge, and thereupon it shall be a part of the record of the case.

SEC. 5. That within one year from the time of entering judgment in a criminal case, and not after, the defendant may petition any justice of the Supreme Court, in term-time or vacation, if such judgment involves necessarily a question arising under the Constitution of the United States or the law of nations, or any judge of the court of federal appeals, in term-time or vacation, if no such question be necessarily involved in such judgment, for a writ of error, who may allow the same unless he deem the judgment complained of plainly right, and may order that such writ shall operate as a stay of proceedings under the judgment; but the allowance of the writ shall not so operate without such order. The justice allowing such writ of error shall take a bond, with sufficient surety or sureties, that such writ shall be prosecuted to effect, and that the defendant shall abide the judgment thereon. And if such writ shall be allowed to operate a stay of proceedings under the judgment, bail may be taken, in a case not capital, by a judge of the court to which the writ of error is directed, for the appearance of the defendant in such court at such time as such judge shall appoint, and that he will not depart therefrom without leave of the court. And a writ so allowed shall be returnable to the next term of the court from which it issued, and a copy thereof shall be served on the Attorney-General of the United States, by leaving the same at his office. And to the end that speedy justice may be done, the courts aforesaid, respectively, shall advance such writs of error on their dockets; and in case of affirmance of a judgment proceedings under which have been stayed, the court in which such judgment was rendered shall again pronounce final sentence and award execution thereon; and if such judgment be reversed, such further proceedings in the case shall be had as the court of error shall direct.

SEC. 6. That when an injunction is granted or continued, by an interlocutory order or decree, in a cause in which an appeal from a final decree could be taken under the provisions of this act, an appeal may be taken from such interlocutory order or decree to the Supreme Court or the court of federal appeals, as the case may be; but such appeal shall be taken within thirty days from the entry of such order or decree, and shall not be a supersedeas, nor shall the same be effective unless the appellant shall give security for costs, as now provided by law, within the said period of thirty days; and an appeal may, in like manner, be taken from any such order or decree dissolving an injunction, and such appeal shall be a supersedeas as to such order, but shall not have effect unless the appellant shall, within the said period of thirty days, give good security for costs and to indemnify and save harmless the sureties on the injunction bond, such security to be given in the way now provided by law; and the proceedings in the court below shall not be stayed except as next hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 7. That the Supreme Court shall from time to time allot the Chief Justice and associate justices of the said court, and the presiding and associate judges of the court of federal appeals, among the circuit courts, in such manner as will best promote dispatch in the administration of justice and as the demands of business in the said courts may require; and whenever a change in the allotment of any of the said justices or judges becomes necessary during the vacation of the Supreme Court, by illness, death, or resignation, such change may be made by the Chief Justice; but a circuit court may not be held by more than two justices or judges; and the judges of the court of federal appeals, when sitting in the circuit courts, are hereby invested with the powers of circuit justices, except that when one of said judges is sitting with a circuit justice the opinion of the latter shall prevail in case of disagreement between them. And the justices and judges empowered to hold circuit courts may hold separate sessions of any circuit court, or sessions of several circuit courts, at the same time: Provided, however, That a circuit justice shall sit only in cases in which the Supreme Court might have appellate jurisdiction. And the defendant in any such case where the jurisdiction depends on the citizenship of the parties may have the judgment or decree therein reviewed by the Supreme Court in the way provided by law, although the amount or value of the thing involved in such judgment or decree, as to such defendant, be less than $15,000 and more than $1,000, exclusive of interest and costs; and the court of federal appeals shall not have jurisdiction in any such case.

SEC. 8. That the court of federal appeals shall have power to issue all writs which may be necessary to the exercise of its jurisdiction and agreeable to the usages and principles of law; but the said court shall not have power to issue the writ of prohibition.

SEC. 9. That the court of federal appeals shall have the jurisdiction heretofore vested in the Supreme Court, and hereby abrogated, to review the judgments and decrees of the circuit courts in civil cases in which the judges of the circuit courts shall be divided in opinion; and such jurisdiction shall be exercised in accordance with the laws now in force.

SEC. 10. That neither the Supreme Court nor the court of federal appeals shall dismiss a cause for want of jurisdiction if the same be within the jurisdiction of the other court, but shall order the same to be transferred to such court, where it shall be proceeded with and be in the same condition as though originally brought to said court; and the court making such transfer is hereby empowered to enter judgment against the plaintiff in error or appellant for costs, including the costs of such transfer.

SEC. 11. That the provisions of law defining the duties and powers of the Supreme Court when less than a quorum is in attendance shall be applicable to each of the divisions of the court of federal appeals.

SEC. 12. That the law now in force authorizing the Supreme Court to hold adjourned and special terms shall be applicable to the court of federal appeals.

SEC. 13. That the process of the court of federal appeals shall bear teste of either one of the presiding judges thereof, and be under the seal of the court and signature of the clerk of the court.

SEC. 14. That the rules of the Supreme Court of the United States for the governance of its appellate jurisdiction shall be the rules of the court of federal appeals until the presiding judges of said court, who are thereto empowered, shall make other rules.

SEC. 15. That the Supreme Court of the United States and the court of federal appeals shall have power to make such orders from time to time touching the security given in any writ of error or appeal as the ends of justice may require.

SEC. 16. That the court of federal appeals shall be a court of record, and have a seal such as the presiding judges may prescribe; and the presiding judges shall appoint a clerk of the said court and one or more deputy clerks, who shall be removable at the pleasure of the presiding judges, and one of whom shall attend the sessions of each of the divisions of the said court.

SEC. 17. That the presiding judges of the court of federal appeals shall appoint a marshal of the said court, who, with the consent and approval of the presiding judges, may appoint assistants and messengers, who, together with the said marshal, shall have the same duties and receive the same compensation respectively as the marshal and assistants and messengers of the Supreme Court of the United States. And the laws applicable to the clerk, deputy clerks, and marshal of the Supreme Court of the United States shall be applicable to the clerk, deputy clerks, and marshal of the court of federal appeals in so far as the said laws are not inconsistent with anything herein contained.

SEC. 18. That any three of the judges of a division shall constitute a quorum; and in the absence of the presiding judge of a division the associate judge senior in commission, or where two or more commissions bear the same date the associate judge senior in age, shall be vested with all the powers of the presiding judge.

SEC. 19. That the judges of the court of federal appeals shall, before entering upon the duties of their office, take the same oaths as are required to be administered to the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States; and each of the presiding judges shall receive an annual salary of —— dollars, payable monthly, and each of the associate judges shall receive an annual salary of —— dollars, payable monthly.

SEC. 20. That the appellate jurisdiction of the circuit courts is hereby abolished, except in cases in error or on appeal now pending in said courts and the supervisory jurisdiction of said courts in bankruptcy.

SEC. 21. That the circuit courts shall have power to make such rules as may be necessary to give effect to this act as to said courts.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I do not know whether it is a reproach to the people of the United States that they may be termed the most litigious people in the world if we count the number of cases that are decided in the courts of justice. Perhaps, instead of its being a reproach, it is a compliment to the people, for it proves that they have a disposition to test their rights upon all proper occasions, and that they are desirous of appealing to tribunals of entire impartiality which may decide controversies between them, rather than to force or wager of battle, and rather than a slavish submission to wrong.

Ours is a very complicated, a very difficult system, particularly with reference to the judiciary. When that statement is made it should give rise to a just concern on the part of men who regulate the legislation of the country to provide every proper facility for the speedy and correct adjudication of all questions that may arise. That we are a litigious people does not argue at all that we have overweening avarice, or that we desire to transgress the law, or that we invade the rights of our neighbors more than any other people. It merely argues that we have great interests at stake which are protected by the only tribunals which the people can properly resort to on all occasions for the adjustment of their rights. There is no point in which government, whether it is local, municipal, or federal, touches the people so nearly as through the judiciary. We enact laws in Congress and in the State Legislatures, and in the different municipal governments throughout the country. They are intended to regulate men in all their relations to society, civil and criminal; they dispose of all the positive rights and all the equities that may exist between the people throughout the length and breadth of this great country.

After we have enacted the laws under the Constitution they pass into the hands of executive officers of the Government for direct application to the people. Before the laws can be administered under our system directly upon or against the people in this country, there must be an intervention of some judicial tribunal; and that may be accounted as one of the greatest safeguards of our liberties that the people have a right to claim, that a judicial tribunal of some character shall intervene between them and the hands of executive or legislative power. Our people may be said to have the best possible protection for their rights and their liberties. They are more interested in the courts than in any of the other tribunals of the country, because they are held more directly responsible to them. A man's life is to be disposed of by the judgment of a court in the case of accusation against him of a high crime. His property is likewise subject to be disposed of in this manner; his liberty, his character, his family relations, and indeed all that goes to make up the man as a social being must be disposed of under our system through the decrees and judgments of the courts of the country. It has, therefore, become an axiomatic principle in our Government, applicable more particularly to ours than to any other form of government with which I am acquainted, that justice shall be administered speedily, and without sale, denial, or delay.

No proposition can be stated that is more intrinsically true or important in our system than the one I have just quoted. It therefore becomes the very highest duty of the legislator in the National Government, as well as in the local government, to see that justice is speedily administered, and that it is done without sale, denial, or delay.

We fall very far short of the performance of our constitutional duty when we allow any serious embarrassment to intervene to prevent the speedy administration of justice. By the speedy administration I do not mean the hasty and hurried administration which oftentimes results in evil, but I mean that administration of justice which is attended with celerity, and at the same time with due deliberation, so that the decrees of the courts, when they are pronounced, may be referred to a just consideration of all that is involved in the case, as well as to a speedy ascertainment and determination of the rights in controversy in all matters in litigation.

We have arrived at that condition in our Federal Government where such a speedy administration of justice has become impossible, and it has become the highest duty that the Congress of the United States owes to the people to remove those impediments which have produced this clog. I cannot conceive of anything connected with the duties of the Congress which is higher, more important, more immediately important, than to provide for the due administration of justice among the people according to the laws and Constitution of our country.

We heard yesterday from one of the wisest and best-informed of the jurists of this country that not merely the Supreme Court of the United States was overburdened with cases which it had not the power to dispose of within a term of three years, but that all or at least a large number of the inferior courts both in the States and in the Territories were under like embarrassment. Cases are piled up on the dockets for sheer want of power to dispose of them to that degree that justice may be said to be denied to the people of the United States. If the people have the right to resort to the courts for the adjudication of their rights, and we refuse or delay to furnish them sufficient facilities for having those rights determined, the charge may be justly laid at the door of Congress that we deny to the people justice. That appears to be a grave accusation, and yet it is no more grave than true. In our numerous engagements, calling our attention to the diversified interests of fifty millions of people, and in a country that is now merely springing into existence, as we may say, a country which has now over one hundred and fifty different forms of government within its borders to deal with, we omit to provide for that most essential and fundamental matter, the speedy administration through the courts of the laws of the land.

Why, sir, I had the honor to make a report the other day in reference to a great land court in the United States, the General Land Office, and there appeared to be pending in that one court alone—for it is only a court—150,000 undisposed of cases, cases in which land titles are brought in question, cases where the titles to the homes of the people are dependent upon adjudications to be made hereafter, and these causes have been accumulating there since the year 1825. I cite this not as being exactly pertinent to the matter now before the Senate, but as an illustration of the danger of delay in the administration of the law among the people who have controversies to be decided.

I will not enlarge upon this topic, Mr. President, because it is so entirely obvious that it has engaged the attention of almost all the thinking men in the different parts of the Union. As we have learned from the remarks of the honorable Senator from Illinois yesterday, a number of plans have been devised through the thoughtfulness and care of many distinguished jurists to provide relief against this prominent evil. We have at last taken up this subject and I do not know whether we shall have the courage or the patience to go to the bottom of it. I am afraid we shall not. I am afraid that we shall substitute some temporary expedient which in the end may prove more injurious than otherwise, and which, instead of curing the evil under which we are now laboring, may only add to our difficulties. It was with a view of presenting another phase of this subject that I thought I would have the bill read which, as I have said, Mr. Maury, of this city, prepared, and which I think is a very wise project in connection with this subject.

I said that I was afraid we should not have the patience and the courage to go to the bottom of this matter and to do what it appears to me is most essential to be done to relieve ourselves of the difficulty. I would begin by removing the cause of the difficulty.

In thinking over this subject my mind has been drawn forcibly to a parallel which exists between the condition of our jurisprudence in the United States and the recent outbreaks of the Mississippi River. The subject has recently broke beyond all control.

So it is in reference to our judicial system. We have, through acts of Congress, been flooding in upon our courts, and especially upon the Federal courts, new elements of jurisdiction, new questions, new matters of adjudication which have at last produced a flood of cases in the Supreme Court and in the inferior Federal courts which we are now trying to relieve against. In this time of great emergency my plan would be to cut down the jurisdiction of the Federal courts and relegate those subjects to the State courts where they were at the time our fathers framed our institutions.

I believe that the difficulties we are under have been the result of unwise legislation in the constant endeavor on the part of the Government of the United States to bring within the jurisdiction of its judges a large field of authority and power which our fathers never intended they should have. Whether we shall be able ever to return to the States any of this jurisdiction is a question that I am almost afraid to express an opinion upon. I am afraid that the Congress of the United States can never be induced to reverse its action upon this subject and to return to the States any part of the power which has been usurped through legislative action in Congress in favor of the Federal judiciary.

If this were a bill to return to the States jurisdiction that properly belongs to them under our federative system, I should be only too happy to advocate it. It will be for the Senate to determine whether this course is to be pursued or whether we are to adopt some plan of relief against this accumulation of business which we cooper up to meet present emergencies. If the Senate shall resolve that this broad scope of jurisdiction shall remain within the control of Federal tribunals, then nothing will remain to us but to devise the best system we can to work off this surplus accumulation of business.

Without dwelling longer on the proposition as to the necessity of taking from the Federal courts a large portion of the jurisdiction that they have recently received through legislative action in Congress, I will proceed to consider comparatively some of the measures which have been suggested to relieve the country of this burden.

The Senator from Illinois yesterday gave us a historical statement of the increase of the business of the Supreme Court of the United States, which I will read for the purpose of again bringing the attention of the Senate anew to it:

> The first volume of Cranch, exclusive of the appendix, which contains an elaborate discussion of a question of commercial law, consists of but three hundred and sixty-six pages, and it embraces all the cases adjudged at three terms, commencing with the August term, 1801, and in nearly all of them the arguments of counsel are given at considerable length. In the succeeding years the business increased but slowly, the average being less than sixty cases a year, and at times it hardly seemed to keep pace with the growth and development of the country. In 1810 there were 98 cases on the docket; in 1820, 127; in 1830, 143; in 1840, 92; in 1850, 253; in 1860, 310; in 1870, 636; in 1880, 1,202, and at the present term, 1,204.

That presents a condition of affairs which renders it absolutely impossible that either nine judges or twenty-nine judges can ever dispose of the docket in the sense of administering justice without delay—administering it speedily. Here we are confronted with something that we must acknowledge to be an insuperable difficulty under our existing system. The arithmetic progression with which these dockets have piled up since the organization of the Supreme Court places it beyond all dispute that we are compelled to furnish some remedy to the country against this evil, or else we are compelled to abandon a constitutional duty which we are sworn to observe, which I believe to be one of the highest and most sacred we have left in our charge.

Not less difficult or embarrassing is the condition of the public business in the inferior courts, the circuit and district courts of the United States. There are many of the circuit and district courts in which there is an accumulation of business that the present force of judges would be incapable of working off in two or three or four years to come.

Consider for a moment the enormous expense that that brings to the clientage which appears before those courts. Here witnesses must be called from term to term; costs must necessarily accumulate. No man, whether he is plaintiff or defendant, can afford to assume that his case is not going to be heard at a particular term unless there is a stipulation in advance to that effect. The enormous waste of time of the witnesses who attend the courts, expenditure of money necessarily attendant upon the slow administration of the business of the courts, is one of the heaviest burdens of taxation that these people have to sustain; and then there are mileage allowed to marshals and to witnesses, fees to jurors, costs to clerks, the records increasing from day to day. After one has got his case through a circuit or district court of the United States (he may have spent all the time from two to ten years in getting it decided in the court below) he brings it to the Supreme Court without the hope of its being reached upon the docket short of a period of three years. That is a denial of justice to the people. We cannot afford to go before the country and say to the people, when we have got $150,000,000 of surplus revenue annually drawn from them by taxation, "We have not the ability to furnish the tribunals necessary for the decision of these causes."

I am arguing upon the assumption that Congress will not cut down the jurisdiction of the Federal courts; that they will maintain the system as it is now, and perhaps go on to increase and broaden that jurisdiction. I am, therefore, arguing in the presence of a difficulty which it is our duty to remove if we have the power to do it. This subject ought not to be allowed to rest until this great embarrassment upon the country has been provided for.

I had a friend this morning to procure for me a statement of the reports of adjudicated cases in the United States, taking the State courts and the different Federal courts together. In Alabama there are 88 volumes; in Arkansas, 36; California, (that young State,) 58; Colorado, 4, (that is in the Territory;) Connecticut, 55; Dakota, 1; Delaware, 12; the District of Columbia, 9; Florida, 17; Georgia, 7; Idaho, 1; Illinois, 108; Indiana, 84; Iowa, 61; Kansas, 26; Kentucky, 77; Louisiana, 107; Maine, 83; Maryland, 95; Massachusetts, 133; Michigan, 52; Minnesota, 27; Mississippi, 62; Missouri, 81; Montana Territory, 3; Nebraska, 11; Nevada, 15; New Mexico, 1; New Hampshire, 62; New Jersey, 76; New York, 550; North Carolina, 89; Ohio, 66; Oregon, 8; Pennsylvania, 219; Rhode Island, 12; South Carolina, 97; Tennessee, 79; Texas, 66; Utah, 2; Vermont, 61; Virginia, 67; Washington Territory, 2; West Virginia, 17; Wisconsin, 64, and Wyoming, 1. Of United States circuit and district court reports there are 157 volumes; of United States Supreme Court reports there are 103 volumes. The Court of Claims reports are to be added. The aggregate of all these reports from the States is: State reports, 3,117 volumes; United States district and circuit court reports, 157 volumes; United States Supreme Court reports, 103 volumes. The total aggregate is 3,377 volumes; and I might add that no two of them are alike.

In these 3,377 different reports of the different courts of the Union, nearly all of them claiming to be a supreme court, law can be found in any shape and style that one may call for. I can find not one decision but many decisions on any side of any question that any man can suggest. Yet numerous questions remain still to be considered and decided; they are arising continually under our changing legislation and under a great variety of circumstances which bring new matters into litigation between the people.

Look at that enormous mass and answer the question, what will it be in a hundred years to come? With our progressive increase of population and wealth, which leads necessarily to an increased litigation, with all the new questions that must arise, what will be the volume of the legal decisions of this country in another century or in another half century? It is a startling proposition to any one who has ever reflected on this subject, and it seems to be one of the matters that is almost beyond control. I have thought that if this system of government should ever be dissolved it would result from the fact that we have such different systems of jurisprudence within the several States, and that our decisions are so variant upon general matters of public right as well as of private right.

Justice in the United States is an expensive luxury. At the same time we must deny the very organic principles of our Government if we do not provide for its speedy and safe administration. We cannot prevent litigation by legislation; we can only provide, under our system of Government, that there shall be a right of a speedy hearing. Perhaps the right of appeal which has been so universally accorded, in all manner of cases, as a part of the justice of our judicial system is, of itself, largely responsible for this great mass of litigation which has gone into the appellate courts and which has added to the expense of the people, and greatly to the confusion of our judicial system; but there stands the evil and we have it to deal with. The question recurs, Which is the best plan?

The honorable Senator from Illinois yesterday stated various plans which have been proposed. Some of them, he said, provided for an increase of the numbers upon the Supreme Court bench. The reasons which the Senator gave in opposition to an increase of the judges of the Supreme Court, the mere numbers of the bench, and for dividing them into sections, as is the case now in the supreme courts of France and of England, it seems to me, are entirely true, and are based upon the necessary construction of our Constitution.

If there is one proposition connected with our judicial establishment which is absolutely true it is that we have but one Supreme Court. In that Supreme Court the Constitution says that the judicial power of the United States is lodged. Now, what is the judicial power of the United States? It is all the power to administer justice that belongs to any government, except so far as it is limited by the express qualifications in the Constitution. The judicial power of a State, which is unlimited except by the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, extends to every question of judicial inquiry, whether it is civil or criminal. The judicial power of the United States extends to every question of judicial cognizance, whether civil or criminal, unless an exception is created by some of the other provisions of the Constitution.

It has been argued that the appellate jurisdiction of the United States Supreme Court is given by a statute. It seems to me that no proposition could be more fallacious than that; that jurisdiction is given by the Constitution of the United States, subject to regulation and control by statute. We can carve out of that jurisdiction what we please. We can deny to the Supreme Court by an act of Congress the power to exercise appellate jurisdiction in cases where we think it should not exercise appellate jurisdiction, but the power was in the Constitution originally lodged in the courts subject to the modification and control of Congress. That does not destroy the unity of the Supreme Court of the United States, nor does it in the slightest degree impair its supremacy as an appellate tribunal. The Supreme Court of the United States is not to exercise such appellate power only as we may dole it out to the courts, for it has appellate power, but it exercises that power in subordination of the legislative will. That is the true statement of the proposition.

Therefore it is true that the Supreme Court of the United States is one supreme court, and any measure by which it may be undertaken to divide that Supreme Court into different sections will be, in my judgment, an unconstitutional invasion of the unity and authority of that great tribunal.

I know that a number of distinguished jurists in the United States differ with me in this opinion; still I cannot reason myself out of the conviction that the Supreme Court is one of the co-ordinate departments of this Government fixed in the Constitution and that we have no right to legislate in reference to that department, except to the extent that is provided in the Constitution itself, for the qualification or modification of its powers or in reference to the manner of their exercise.

I am, therefore, entirely in harmony with the views of the Senator from Illinois on that branch of the proposition, and the bill of Mr. Maury is also in harmony with those views. I would regret to see the day when we would divide the courts into sections and require three or four judges to sit upon one class of cases and three or four upon another class of cases, and to have their decision entered upon the record of the court. No judge ought ever to be compelled to give his sanction to a decision in any cause unless he is entirely familiar with it and unless he participates in the judgment; and he must participate just as fully as any other judge does in hearing the cause. That is the elementary and indispensable requisite of a correct judicial decision to be made by a court consisting of more than one judge. Each judge on the bench must consider the cause for himself, and the parties litigant before that court as well as the country at large have the right to the wisdom, the industry, the careful investigation, and the conscience of every judge trying a cause upon every question which is made in the case. A judge may concur with the majority, or he may dissent, but still it is the right of the parties litigant before the court to have the judgment of every judge upon every question that comes before it, and nothing can be said to be a perfect administration which does not go to that extent.

I therefore recognize the constitutional impossibility as well as the practical impossibility in view of a wise administration of justice in the Supreme Court by merely increasing the members upon the bench. You may add to that bench as many judges as you please, and the judges themselves will decide that the court is a unit, and that every judge must hear every case that is presented to it. That has been the practice in the Supreme Court of the United States from its first organization.

It is not proper, I think, that we should venture upon an experiment of that kind when the judges would meet our law, after we had enacted it, with the answer "We are a unit, and you cannot divide us up into different tribunals and assign the power of rendering a final judgment to two, three, or four men in this tribunal." There must be one judgment, and to be one judgment it must be the judgment of every man upon the bench; it must be the judgment expressed pro or con., the judgment of every man who participates in the investigation.

We come to the proposition that we cannot relieve that court merely by increasing its number. In fact we would only increase the difficulty of deciding causes in the Supreme Court by an increase of the numbers. If you had a court of thirty members it would require the investigation of thirty different minds upon thirty records and briefs, and a consultation among this large number, where I think we should be sinking wisdom in numbers rather than gaining strength or safety from a multitude of counsel.

It is true in the experience of the great jurists of the earth that the smaller tribunals are the stronger and more powerful as courts. Bring a question of law before the Senate in which a large majority of the body are trained lawyers and ask them to decide it by a vote, and oftener than otherwise you will find them divided in nearly equal numbers upon either side of an intricate question of law. Take the debate on the Geneva award fund, if you please, which has been before the Senate ever since I have had the honor of a seat on this floor. Who has ever come to a conclusion, or even a guess, as to what the Senate would do in the decision of that case? Yet it is a question of law, or a question of equity based upon law. It is the very number of minds engaged here in thinking over these questions that produces the difficulty. I can pick a committee of five out of the Senate of its most enlightened jurists and lay the Geneva award question before them and get a decision satisfactory to the entire country after they have heard argument upon both sides; but neither the Senate nor the House of Representatives nor the country perhaps will ever be satisfied with the decision that we shall make upon the law of that intricate and involved question. I mention this to show the difficulty of getting large bodies into harmony of action on judicial questions.

Another very serious difficulty in the bill under discussion is that it divides the responsibility between too many. There is nothing which brings a man's mind right down to his duties so quickly and firmly as to burden him with a great responsibility which rests upon him exclusively or upon a very few associated with him. There is nothing like it. If you want safe and wise judgments in the courts, that will stand the test of time, you must have men to render them who have imposed upon them all the weight of responsibility that you can bring to bear on their minds and consciences.

I do not look to an increase of the number of judges on the Supreme Court bench with any hope of relief from the difficulties to which I have adverted. We must take some other plan. What other plan can be suggested besides an intermediate court of appeals? None that I can think of; none that the wisest men in this country have as yet been able to bring forward.

I therefore heartily concur with the honorable Senator from Illinois in his project of having an intermediate court of appeals, but I think he has too many intermediate courts of appeal. I think that we shall have much the same difficulty as now, in kind if not in degree, in having nine organizations in the United States as courts of appeal. We have too many now. It is proposed to add nine others, and these other nine will all be in the exercise of exactly the same jurisdiction. We shall have eight chances to one of inextricable confusion in the decisions of these courts, to increase year after year as we progress with this system.

We have one Supreme Court, whose adjudications are an honor to the American people, of which they may be justly proud. I will not deny that on some occasions that court even has been influenced to make decisions which perhaps will not stand the test of future investigation. That court has sometimes found itself compelled to overrule some of its own decisions. It has always done so boldly and freely, and with a view to the ultimate security of justice according to law; but if that court had been divided into sections, one sitting in Maine, one in California, and one in Florida, if they had been considering the questions apart from each other, deprived of the advantage of conferring upon great and difficult questions which have been presented to it for consideration in the past, we should have had confusion and trouble instead of harmony and strength in its decisions.

I cannot bring my mind to believe that nine courts of federal appeal intermediate between the Supreme Court and the circuit and district courts of the United States would ever agree in their lines of decision, even upon great and important topics, in such manner as would put questions at rest. I think we have a plan in this bill which will result in greater confusion than we now have and in the mere addition to the contradiction and contrariety of decisions which are now a burden upon the jurisprudence of the United States.

Why do we want to have nine courts? For no other reason than for the accommodation of the bar. Being a member of that profession, I can speak freely upon the subject and against their being accommodated at the expense of the country. You would go to New Orleans with a court because that is a great commercial center and nearly the center of a district. You wish to go to New York, to Saint Louis, to Chicago, to San Francisco with another for the same reason—all for the accommodation of the members of the bar.

Appellate courts do not have people brought before them to be heard in open court; witnesses do not attend. The record is made up in the court below and transmitted to a clerk. It is printed in the appellate court along with the briefs of counsel. A few lawyers assemble, just as we see every day in the august tribunal that sits in this Capitol. A few lawyers attend to make their arguments before the court according to its rules of practice. The clients are far distant, it may be beyond the seas, and never feel that it is necessary to come to Washington to look after their causes. No one attends but the lawyers engaged in the cases.

The question whether we shall have nine courts or one court is a question that involves nothing except the convenience of the bar. If there is anything else in it I cannot see it or understand it. The precise issue upon that branch of the bill is whether we shall have nine courts, with the danger of leading to this confusion in our judicial system, or whether we shall have one intermediate court, located here or where it may be more convenient.

I am in favor of one court. I am in favor of Mr. Maury's proposition in this respect, because it provides for the appointment of ten judges instead of eighteen. We would relieve ourselves to the extent of eight judges by taking a court located at Washington or located anywhere that you please, instead of a court of eighteen judges to be appointed in addition to those who are upon the bench now.

If the Congress will do full justice by this subject, if they will consult the welfare and interests of the people of the United States instead of a particular class of professional men, we shall find no difficulty in having a court of appeals here which will answer not only all the purposes designed in the bill of the honorable Senator from Illinois but answer them in a very much better manner, I think, than his bill provides for. The bill of the honorable Senator takes the circuit and district judges who are now in office and eighteen judges, to be added to them, two for each circuit, and groups them in different circuits in nine courts of appeals.

I will not dwell longer upon what the course of action would likely be between these various courts leading to conflict and confusion. I will now call the attention of the Senate to a topic that I beg them to consider in the light in which I intend to present it, as an honest and faithful review in part of the existing judicial system in the United States. I do not intend to cast reproach unnecessarily upon any man, and I do not intend to arouse any feeling about this business.

We have nine circuit judges in the United States. I have no remarks to make about them except that some of them were appointed in times of high political excitement, and they seem to feel that it is a part of their judicial duty to respond on all occasions where opportunity is afforded to the sentiment which led to their appointment. I am not overstating the case in this matter. No Senator here can deny to his own conscience, I think, the fact that judges now upon the bench in the United States have been appointed not merely because of their political opinions, but because of their intensity in the service of their party; because it was expected of them when they got upon the bench that in all cases which might arise that had any political significance they could be counted on to give a decision in favor of the views of the party which appointed them to office.

That is a grave accusation to make against any government or any people, but I make it in the light of the facts. History bears me out in this statement fully and completely; and now that we are passing into a better state of feeling in this country, I appeal to Senators on all sides that in the further increase of the bench we shall have an opportunity to get men fresh from the country, who will have a chance to come to the bench free from the exacerbation of feeling on political subjects, which, I think, has too often led to serious injustice on the bench.

This political partisanship is more particularly true, I think, in reference to the district courts than it is as to the circuit courts. I believe that more of the district judges have been appointed in consideration of their extreme party bias than of the circuit judges, in proportion to their numbers, and they have responded to the motives that led to their appointment by various acts upon the bench, some of which an American ought to blush to be compelled to recite before the Senate of the United States.

I prefer that the President of the United States, Republican as he is, with the Senate, Republican as it is, should have the selection of the ten judges who will compose this court, out and out, from the people who are qualified to occupy these places, to taking up the old fossils who are upon the bench, and who have become indurated in the service of their party rather than in the service of their country. Above all things, let us have a judiciary upon which the people can lean in confidence, and feel that they can submit their controversies to them without the expectation of party bias or feeling intervening to affect the judgment of the courts. No disgrace like that can be inflicted upon a country without the most serious injury to all classes of people.

I speak upon this subject not only with knowledge but with feeling, because in the State where I live district judges since the close of the war have been the mere tools of party. I do not wish to see men of that class put upon the court of appeals. Some of them have not quite the ability to preside in the district courts and to conduct the business of that court in a proper way. What have they in the way of talent or learning or ability of any kind for a court of federal appeals? They would be a mere drag and an incubus upon it. Why should we go to them and invite them into a court of appeals? Every reason that occurs to me is against it. They are the very judges that a court of appeals is needed to control. I believe in the independence of the judicial system in all of its gradations of authority as well as in its independence of legislative or executive control. I believe that a great deal of the power and influence of that court depends upon its constitutional and legal independence. I have had great doubts about the propriety of permitting the judges of the Supreme Court to preside in the circuits at all. The only argument in favor of it that I can think of is that they have an opportunity of understanding the people of the country, of mixing with them and understanding the different local systems of jurisprudence throughout the States in which they may chance to preside, but I now believe that it would be better if no judge of the Supreme Court of the United States should ever be permitted to sit upon a cause on a circuit.

Mr. President, I have said that I had a right to know something about the fitness of some district judges to sit in a court of appeals. I have a painful right to know it. Justice has been perverted in the district courts of the United States in Alabama, it seems to me, in an arbitrary and tyrannical manner. Do you remember—of course you do—that no appeal is allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States in any criminal cause? Appeals are allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States in all that concerns a man's property, provided he has got five thousand dollars' worth in a controversy. In every constitutional question and in every question of the construction of a United States statute which concerns a man's property, he may have an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, but when you come to take his life from him by decree or judgment of a Federal court, or to imprison him for any period of years, or to impose fines and penalties upon him, no appeal is allowed under our judicial system.

What was the reason assigned for it by the honorable Senator from Illinois yesterday? That the court could not bear the burden which appeals in criminal cases would impose upon it; that the court would find it impossible to decide questions of life and liberty, and therefore this great tribunal must be confined simply to questions of property, and that too only when the amount in controversy exceeds $5,000. All that class of people who do not happen to own five thousand dollars' worth of property, all that class of people who may be subjected to political persecution, all who may be the victims of wrong and outrage, must go unrequited of justice in the great appellate tribunal organized by the Constitution, and for the only reason that if they were allowed to come here with their complaints the court would be so clogged with business that it could not afford to undertake the job of administering justice.

When the honorable Senator, who has had so much experience upon the bench, was reciting that fact to us, I could but wonder what posterity would think of us, fifty or a hundred years to come, when it should be announced to them and reflected upon by them that the Government of the United States had denied to every man in the United States the protection of the Supreme Court in all matters of life and liberty, and merely because Congress could not find a method by which these questions could be considered. It is a reproach to our judicial system, and has been from the foundation of the Government. There is not a lawyer, I think, who ever examined the question who has not felt that it was a wrong.

The judges have the virtual decision of all cases in the district and circuit courts. Only a few days ago a case occurred in Alabama under the election laws of the United States, and which shows the power of the judges. Three men had been appointed inspectors of election at Huntsville, in Alabama. One was a Greenbacker, one a Democrat, and one a Republican. A contested election was pending in the House of Representatives—it is pending there now—and it became necessary to have a decision of the Federal courts that certain ballots which had been excluded by the inspectors as being contrary to the statutes of the State of Alabama were after all valid ballots, and that the men who had excluded them had violated the laws of the United States. An indictment was found. A jury was summoned, and at the head of that jury stood a man whose intelligence and character would entitle him to a seat on the floor of the Senate. I know him well. He is a thoroughly conscientious gentleman. Associated with him upon that jury were Republicans, Greenbackers, and Democrats. The witness who was examined for the Government was one of the inspectors. He was the Greenbacker and a relative of the gentleman now contesting the seat in the House. He testified that when the inspectors opened the box and examined the ballots they found that there were certain prints upon some of them which in their opinion rendered them invalid under the laws of Alabama, but not being quite certain of that they took legal advice, the best that could be had, and after due consideration, upon their oaths as inspectors they decided that a certain number of those ballots cast for the Democrats were invalid and certain other of those ballots cast for the Greenbackers were invalid, and they threw them out. It turned out that the larger number of ballots thus inspected and thus thrown out had been cast in favor of the Greenbacker. The indictment was predicated upon that state of facts and this gentleman was brought in to testify. He swore to these facts. He stated that neither himself nor his coinspector so far as he knew had the slightest idea of violating any laws of the United States. He said they were acting under oath as inspectors, and under the laws of the State of Alabama they believed they had the right to reject these ballots; if they were mistaken in their opinions it was only a mistake of judgment; nothing more. The judge who presided in that case, knowing that no superior tribunal could control him, after the district attorney had signified his purpose to abandon the case and said that there was really nothing in it, charged the jury that if the jury believed the evidence in the case the defendants were guilty.

Now, what chance did those defendants have? What is a court? A court for the trial of a criminal cause under the Constitution of the United States is a judge and twelve jurors, and the judge can no more convict a man of an offense, or acquit him either, without the jury than the jury can without the judge. The two constitutional tribunals or powers combined together under the law comprise a court, and without either there can be no court. Each have their rights, their privileges, and their duties. Here the judge, against whose decision there could be no appeal, said to the jury: "If you believe the evidence in this case, the defendants are guilty." Thereupon the foreman of the jury arose and asked the court: Have we a right to apply the law in this case to the facts? In the event that we find the defendants in this cause were not influenced by any corrupt or improper motive, but honestly believed that they were doing right, have we a right to take that into consideration? Said the court: Yes, you can take that into consideration, but I have charged you if you believe the evidence in this case you must find the defendants guilty. The jury went out and they refused to find them guilty; they found a verdict of not guilty. In that one instance, if there is no other to be recorded in the history of this country, that jury nobly vindicated the rights of juries under the Constitution and laws of this land, and for that reason they were immediately and indignantly discharged for the term by that judge.

I have recited the facts of this case, as I am assured they are true. I say that the conduct of this judge was influenced by no other reason than because there was a contested case pending in the House of Representatives. The judge made a decision of that kind against the validity of the action of the inspectors, so that his friend might be seated in the House.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire the name of that judge?

Mr. MORGAN. His name is Bruce. Now, I will give you another case decided by that judge, and you will see what sort of a court-of-appeals judge he would make. He is a district judge, who has the right to exercise circuit court powers whenever the circuit court judge is not there, and in conjunction with him when he is there. He is not the presiding judge in any sense, but he has got all the powers and jurisdiction of the circuit judge when the circuit judge is not present. The fifth circuit comprises the States of Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas.

Mr. INGALLS. How long has he been on the bench?

Mr. MORGAN. He has been on the bench about ten years, I think.

Mr. GEORGE. He is the successor of Busteed.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, he is the successor of Busteed, but not so talented a man as Busteed.

Mr. INGALLS. Is he a native of the district?

Mr. MORGAN. He is a native of Scotland, as I am informed. He was never in the district until he came there among that elect band that we call "carpet-baggers" in the South. But I do not wish to speak of him in that connection; I am speaking of his acts on the bench. I am speaking now to convince the Senate, if I can do it, that there are some men on the district bench who are not proper men to be carried into a court of appeals, men who have not the wisdom or the qualifications in other respects to entitle them to preside in a court of such dignity and power. I do not want to add anything to the power of such men. If I am compelled to endure them, as I suppose I must be, with patience and resignation, I will not be a party to increasing their powers in any contingency or under any circumstances.

I have a record of the Supreme Court of the United States here in another cause that came from that judge. This was a suit upon coupons detached from bonds which had been issued by a town in Alabama, the city of Opelika. The party in bringing his suit upon these coupons, he holding the bonds at the time, had detached a little over five thousand dollars' worth of the coupons, and included them all in his action. The defendants pleaded various pleas of non est factum, to which demurrers were sustained by the court. Thereupon there was what we call there the sworn plea of non assumpsit, which puts in issue the factum, the instrument sued upon, and requires the plaintiff to prove its validity throughout. It is the general issue sworn to under the practice in Alabama, which has obtained there for a great many years, long before I came to the bar in that State.

The court had pronounced its opinion upon these demurrers, and the parties went to the jury. The plaintiff introduced his coupons and the defendant introduced all the records of the proceedings of the city of Opelika upon which a plea was predicated, that the action of the authorities in that city was ultra vires, and the bonds were therefore void. The parties argued their cause and the judge charged the jury to the effect that if they believed the evidence they must find for the plaintiff, the defendant undertaking to protect himself by asking charges just the converse of those which had been asked by the plaintiff. After the case had gone to the jury the plaintiff asked leave not to enter a retraxit, a discharge, or a release of a part of his cause of action, but to withdraw a certain number of the coupons from the suit, so as to bring the verdict that the jury must render within the sum of $5,000. It was objected by counsel on the other side that such a course would cut them off from all opportunity of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and that was the design of the motion. The plaintiff did not ask leave to enter a retraxit or release of the sum over $5,000, but to amend the pleadings and exclude these coupons, which its counsel might select from this action, and leave them, of course, in condition to be again sued upon. The effect of that judgment was, of course, to validate beyond all dispute and denial thereafter every coupon cut from the bonds and the bonds themselves. The bonds amounted to about twenty-five thousand dollars, and the coupons, which had matured and been sued upon, amounted to over $5,000. The point was made before the court that the object of the motion was only to deprive the defendant in this case of the right of appeal to the Supreme Court. The court against that objection thus made openly in court allowed the coupons to be withdrawn, and the jury thereupon were instructed to bring in a verdict for $4,765.64, and the man's appeal was taken away from him.

I do not know how to characterize a thing of that sort with proper deference to the tribunal before which I am now speaking. A man who will undertake to deny to a party the right to review his decisions on the bench can never be a qualified person, in my judgment, to sit in a court of appeals.

I have got another case to illustrate the unfitness of this judge to preside in any court. It was another action upon coupons cut from bonds issued by the county of Chambers, in Alabama. A judgment was obtained in favor of some Cubans; thereupon a motion was made in the circuit court of the United States for a writ of mandamus to compel the commissioners of the county of Chambers to levy a tax, in accordance with the statutes of Alabama, for the collection of the judgment out of the people of that county. The board of county commissioners, the president of which was the judge of probate, obeyed the order as far as the statutes of Alabama authorized; that is to say, they levied a tax in precise conformity to the statutes of Alabama. However, the order of the judge contained another requisition upon them, not only that they should levy a tax, but that they should collect the money. That they had no power to do. No statute of Alabama or of the United States authorized them to collect the money. That is the duty of a tax collector, not of a court.

It was their duty to levy a tax but not to collect it. Hence they could not perform the duty, and did not undertake to perform it; but in the most respectful manner they certified their action to the court. Thereupon the court ordered an attachment against them under a rule to show cause why they should not be punished for a contempt. They came forward and made their answer to the writ of attachment. They set up that they had complied with their duty to the court, and in the most respectful manner undertook to show the court in their return that they had done all they could do. At the preceding term the court had pronounced judgment against them, that they were in contempt for not collecting the money, and stayed that judgment until the next term of the court, expressly, as stated in the judgment, that they might have the opportunity, not to collect it out of the people, but to pay it. The next term of the court passed away and it was suggested that the debt had not been paid. Thereupon a writ of attachment issued against them. They came forward and made further answer, setting forth that they had done all that the law authorized them to do; that no statute had authorized them to collect money from the people, and they would be trespassers if they undertook in person to collect it. The court thereupon sentenced the remaining commissioners to imprisonment in the common jail of Montgomery County, (two of the commissioners had died,) and they were to remain there until that debt was paid. I wish to read to the Senate the judgment in that case:

Dix & Co. vs. P. M. Rowland, judge of probate of Chambers County, D. C. Shutze and R. C. Germany, members of the court of county commissioners of said county of Chambers, in the State of Alabama. November 21, 1881, proceeding by attachment for contempt.

In this proceeding by attachment for contempt all the parties this day appeared in this court, and were further heard by this court touching the matters of contempt involved in this proceeding.

And it appearing to the court that at the last term of this court, to wit, on July 16, 1881, the respondents, the said Rowland, Shutze, and Germany, were fully heard as to the said matters of contempt in disobeying the said peremptory writ of mandamus duly issued out of this court, theretofore to them, and duly served on them, and that upon said hearing the said respondents were duly and properly adjudged and found by this court to be guilty of contempt of this court in relation to said peremptory writ of mandamus mentioned in this proceeding for contempt, and in disobeying said last named writ, but that said respondents were required to appear in this court on the first day of this term, to receive such sentence as this court may deem meet to pronounce in the premises; and it is now made further to appear to this court that said respondents have not obeyed said peremptory writ of mandamus, nor certified any such obedience, but still continue to disobey said writ of peremptory mandamus, and that said respondents are guilty of said contempt in disobeying said peremptory writ of mandamus, and that the judgment of said Dix & Co. mentioned in that writ, and in respect to which that writ was issued, remains wholly unpaid and unsatisfied and of full force, and that the amount due upon said last-mentioned judgment, including the principal and lawful interest thereon, and the costs up to this day, is $3,152:

It is, therefore, considered, ordered, and adjudged, by this court, that the said respondents, the said P. M. Rowland, D. C. Shutze, and R. C. Germany, are guilty of said contempt in disobeying as well as in continuing to disobey the said peremptory writ of mandamus, and the order and command of this court therein, and that for said contempt each of respondents is here and now sentenced by this court to pay to the United States, as a fine for his said contempt, the sum of $1,088, and to be and to stand imprisoned in the common jail of Montgomery County, in the State of Alabama, until the said fine hereby imposed upon him, and all the costs of this proceeding for contempt are paid; that in addition to said fines hereby imposed upon each of said respondents respectively, the sentence of this court also is, that said respondents pay all the costs of this proceeding, and stand imprisoned, as aforesaid, until the whole of said costs shall be paid. But the court further orders and adjudges, that if the said judgment of said Dix & Co., under and in respect to which said peremptory writ of mandamus issued, and also all the costs of this proceeding and of the proceedings in which said peremptory mandamus issued, shall hereafter be paid and satisfied in full, and such satisfaction be entered on the execution docket or minutes of this court before the said fines are paid, then and in that event all further proceedings under said sentence of this court shall thereupon cease, and the said respondents shall thence be discharged from imprisonment under said sentence.

Now, what is that? Each of these men was fined to the extent of exactly one-third of that judgment, interest and cost. In favor of whom is the fine imposed? The Government of the United States; but the court provided in its judgment that even after the court had adjourned, and the question of the collection of that fine had passed clear beyond the power of the court, if the prisoners would pay the judgment of Dix & Co., the fine in favor of the United States should be remitted, and they should be discharged from imprisonment, thus using the criminal power and the majesty of the law of this land to extort from men who were locked up in prison, in the common jail of Montgomery County, a sum of money under the pretext that it was imposed as a fine to be paid over to Dix & Co., and if paid to them then the Government of the United States was not to receive any part of the fine.

Here is a contempt of court, so called. Here is a judge who fined three men for a contempt of court. He imposed a penalty upon these men because it was alleged by the court that the honor and dignity of the judicial tribunals of the United States had been violated by their contempt of the order of the court, and after thus parceling out the fine in these exact figures, dividing the sum of $3,152 by 3, and finding that that was the measure of the contempt inflicted upon the Government of the United States, the court made provision that the Government should lose its fine, and then the contempt against it should be expurgated, in the event that the prisoners would pay the judgment to Dix & Co. A State judge was locked up in a county jail with two of the commissioners of Chambers County, under a void order of the district judge, for a term of imprisonment to which no limit was fixed in the sentence of the court.

I think that no plainer instance of judicial tyranny than that was ever recorded in the books. The Supreme Court of the United States considered this question, and after these men had lain in jail from the middle of November until late in January, told them to go hence without day; that this judge had acted beyond his powers in the imprisonment that he imposed upon them.

What is the liberty of a citizen of the United States worth in a court of that kind? There was no appeal from that decision, no law of Congress authorizing an appeal. There was no writ by which it could be reached except the writ of habeas corpus attended by a certiorara; and the Supreme Court of the United States really had to invent a means by which they could correct this great outrage upon these men. Mr. Rowland, the judge of probate in that suit, is as venerable a man as any who sits upon this floor, a man of the highest possible character and a man who suffered in his feelings as well as in his person beyond the power of description by the incarceration.

Am I to be invited by this bill to take the man who made that decision and put him on the court of appeals, and put more power into his hands? I am not responsible for his being on that bench, but I would be responsible if I did not rise in the Senate of the United States and state these reasons, and put them on record here, why that man should not go upon a court of appeals. This is a painful duty for me to perform, for I scarcely know him, but I could not reconcile it to my honor as a Senator to remain silent while a bill was pending here to propose in any event or any contingency to take that man and give him more power and put him on the bench of a high court of appeals.

There may be others like him; it is not for me to say. I speak within the bounds of the records and of my knowledge and information upon this question. The facts are undeniable. I give but one instance of the unfitness of a judge; there may be others. I believe that there are others quite as conspicuous as that.

It is one part of the evil of the times that the people have had judges put upon them who were unworthy of the position, and that being a fact which we must confront and cannot get rid of, we ought not to increase the evil by calling these men in to preside in a court of appeals.

You may say we can control them or that the other judges will control them. I do not know whether they will or whether they will not; but, sir, it is not proper material for a court of appeals. I very much prefer Mr. Maury's plan, which selects men that the party in power is now willing to indorse after the fury and rage of party hatred which grew out of our late struggle have somewhat passed away. I will not vote for a bill that has got such a provision in it. I will undertake to modify it in the course of the consideration of the amendments which may be offered here, but if this class of men are to comprise a part of the court of appeals to which this great power is given by the proposed enactment, I can never give my consent to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the first amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, which will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. The first amendment of the committee is, in section 2, line 3, after the word "error," to insert "from the district courts;" and in line 5, after the word "eighty," to insert "two;" so as to make the section read:

That the several circuit courts of the United States shall have and exercise no jurisdiction in cases of appeals or writs of error from the district courts allowed, taken, or sued out after the 1st day of September, 1882, except that reviews in bankruptcy cases, in the exercise of their supervisory jurisdiction, may be had as heretofore provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 9, after the word "designated," to strike out "for each term of the court by the circuit judge who is senior in office, upon due notice in writing" and insert "by an order of the court at each term thereof to serve for the succeeding term;" and after the word "any," in line 12, to strike out "three" and insert "four;" so as to read:

The said court of appeals shall consist of the justice of the Supreme Court assigned to the circuit, and of the circuit judges thereof and two of the district judges, to be designated by an order of the court at each term thereof to serve for the succeeding term, the designation to be made as far as practicable in rotation, any four of whom, including at least one judge competent to preside, shall constitute a quorum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, line 15, after the words "absence of," to strike out "the justice of the Supreme Court, or of either circuit judge, or of;" and in line 17, after the word "designated," to strike out "in manner aforesaid" and insert "by the judges then present;" so as to read:

In case of the absence of a district judge so designated, another district judge may be designated by the judges then present to serve as long as such absence shall continue.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I have an amendment which I should like to offer to section 3, if it is now in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is usual to consider the committee amendments first. After they are disposed of the Senator can offer any amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the reported amendments will be proceeded with.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, at the end of section 5, to add:

Nor shall the maximum compensation of the marshal, including all his fees and emoluments, exceed that allowed by existing law, nor shall the clerk receive for his entire compensation more than the sum of $3,500 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, line 13, before the word "appeal," to insert "such;" and in line 14, after the word "within," to strike out "ninety days" and insert "six months;" so as to read:

No such appeal shall be taken or writ of error sued out except within six months after the entry of the order, decree, or judgment sought to be reviewed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, to strike out the following clause between lines 34 and 42:

In case the decision or determination of such court of appeals shall so modify or reverse such order or decree of the court below as to cause the same to become a final decree, an appeal from such direction of the court of appeals shall be allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States, in the cases and according to the manner hereinafter provided for appeals from decrees in equity entered by the direction of the court of appeals.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out "SEC. 7" and the words "that the Supreme Court shall from time to time, as may be necessary, adopt;" and, in line 52, after the word "and," to strike out "promulgate rules to regulate;" so as to read:

All provisions of law now in force prescribing the cases in which appeals may be taken or writs of error sued out for the review by the Supreme Court of the final judgment or decree of a circuit or a district court shall, except as modified by this act, apply to an appeal taken or a writ of error sued out under this section; and the manner of taking such appeal or suing out such writ of error, or of staying proceedings in the inferior courts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, [7,] line 55, after the word "courts," to insert:

Shall be governed by the laws now in force touching appeals from the circuit court to the Supreme Court and writs of error from the Supreme Court to the circuit court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, line 58, before the word "section," to strike out "the sixth" and insert "this;" and after the word "section," to strike out "of this act;" so as to read:

Subject to the provisions of this section as to the time of taking such appeal or suing out such writ of error.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to change "section 8" to "section 7."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, [8,] line 4, after the word "eighty," to insert "two;" in line 6, after the word "cases," to strike out "which shall be pending in any circuit court on said day upon appeal or writ of error" and insert "wherein, on or before said day, an appeal has been allowed by a district court, or a writ of error sued out from any circuit court;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That all appeals and writs of error taken, allowed, or sued out upon or from any judgments or decrees of the circuit and district courts, entered after the 1st day of September, 1882, shall be taken, allowed, or sued out under and according to the provisions of this act, and not otherwise; but all cases wherein, on or before said day, an appeal has been allowed by a district court, or a writ of error sued out from any circuit court, shall be heard and determined by such circuit court in the same manner as if this act had not been passed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, [9,] after the word "writ," to insert "nor after a refusal to allow the writ by one such judge shall it be allowed by another judge;" so as to read:

SEC. 8. That a writ of error, if allowed by a judge of the proper court of appeals, may be sued out of that court from the final judgment of a circuit or district court in any criminal case to such court of appeals within ninety days after the entry of such judgment; but such writ shall not operate as a stay of proceedings, except in capital cases, unless it is so ordered by the judge who shall allow the writ, nor after a refusal to allow the writ by one such judge shall it be allowed by another judge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, before the word "section," in line 11, to strike out "eleventh" and insert "tenth;" so as to read:

The judgment upon such writ shall be final unless certified as hereinafter provided in the tenth section of this act, and shall be remitted to the circuit or the district court appealed from, to be enforced according to law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 9, [10,] line 12, after the word "eighty," to insert "two;" in the same line, after "1882," to strike out, "at which time it shall, by an order to be entered of record, fix the times at which it shall be thereafter held, which times may be from time to time changed by the court" and insert "and on the second Tuesdays in May and first Tuesdays in November thereafter;" so as to read:

The first term of said court shall be held at each of said places on the first Tuesday in November, 1882, and on the second Tuesdays in May and first Tuesdays in November thereafter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the end of section 9, [10,] to strike out "at least two terms shall be held in each year."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 10, [11,] before the word "costs," in line 10, to strike out "interest and;" in line 11, after the words "construction of," to insert "either;" and in the same line, after the word "or," to insert "the construction or the validity of;" so as to read:

But a review upon the law may be had upon writ of error or appeal in the manner now provided by law to the Supreme Court of the United States from every final judgment or decree of the court of appeals, where the matter in controversy exceeds the sum or value of $10,000, exclusive of costs, or where the adjudication involves a question upon the construction of the Constitution or the construction or the validity of a treaty or a law of the United States, or where the court shall certify that the adjudication involves a legal question of sufficient importance to require that the final decision thereof should be made by the Supreme Court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, line 18, after the words "Constitution or," to insert "the construction or the validity;" so as to read:

But in the two last mentioned cases the court of appeals shall state the specific question arising upon the construction of the Constitution, or the construction or the validity of such treaty or law, or the specific legal question that the adjudication involves.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, line 25, after the word "opinion," to strike out:

And in patent and copyright cases in equity a review by the Supreme Court may be had, without regard to the sum or value in dispute, upon the questions both of law and fact affecting the validity or the infringement of the patent or the copyright: Provided, That the court of appeals shall certify that a question is involved of sufficient importance to render it proper that the final decision thereof should be made by the Supreme Court.

And insert in lieu thereof:

Provided, That in all cases in which by existing laws the Supreme Court may now exercise appellate jurisdiction without regard to the sum in controversy, except in cases touching patent rights and copyrights, the Supreme Court shall continue to have and exercise such jurisdiction in the manner now provided by law.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I wish that some member of the Judiciary Committee would explain why this amendment is proposed, by which, as I understand, the Supreme Court of the United States is divested of jurisdiction in cases touching patent rights and copyrights and the jurisdiction is left in the court of appeals.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Supreme Court now has jurisdiction in patent-right and copyright cases without regard to the amount in controversy in actions at law. The original bill recognized that. That is amended by the committee. They thought that cases involving the construction and validity of patents or of copyrights should fare no better than other cases, that they should be governed by the amount in controversy as to the right to go to the final appellate tribunal. If the amount involved is $10,000, of course there is an appeal to the Supreme Court. The committee were not unanimous on the subject, but a majority of the committee were of opinion that patent-right and copyright cases should not fare as they have done heretofore, better than others, and go to the Supreme Court without regard to the amount in controversy. There has been a great deal of complaint in that respect throughout the country. There seems to be no reason why those cases should be considered by the Supreme Court without regard to the amount in controversy, whereas a matter involving the property of A B or of C D cannot go there unless at least $5,000 be involved.

The amount now is $5,000; nothing is appealable to the Supreme Court under $5,000 in ordinary cases; but cases involving the construction or the validity of patents and copyrights are excepted from that rule. The majority of the committee were of opinion that they should not be so excepted, that they ought to fare the same as other cases. That is the reason of the amendment.

It is proper probably for me to say that in introducing this bill I recognized that these cases should be heard without regard to the amount in controversy, but the Judiciary Committee overruled me in that particular.

Mr. PLATT. There are certain other cases besides patent-right cases and copyright cases, in which the Supreme Court has jurisdiction without reference to the sum involved.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. That is so as to revenue cases.

Mr. PLATT. The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is still preserved in those cases by this bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. They are altogether cases in which the Government is concerned.

Mr. PLATT. With great deference to the Committee on the Judiciary I wish to make this suggestion: as was said by the Senator from Illinois yesterday, the principal objection which has been urged to this bill and which had most force in his mind is that there may be different decisions in the different courts of appeal throughout the country and that there may be confusion arising from that fact. Now, does not the Senator think that patent-right cases are precisely the cases in which confusion is most likely to arise by reason of different decisions in different circuits throughout the country?

Mr. GARLAND. As was stated by the Senator from Illinois, the committee was not unanimous in this view of the matter, and for one I am very much disposed to favor the view of the Senator from Connecticut. I wish to put the Senate exactly in possession of the ideas that occur to me, and that occurred to the committee as I recollect.

One great difficulty in patent and copyright cases, when you come to speak of the amount, is how you are going to find out the amount in controversy exactly, because the very contest itself is always predicated upon a doubtful state of the case as to the result. It would be impossible in many instances to make an estimate really of what is in controversy in a contest of this character. I was disposed for one for that reason to leave the jurisdiction untrammeled so far as the amount is concerned in patent and copyright cases.

Then there is another reason which occurs to me. In effect the Government granting the patent or copyright is a party to the suit, and she has never been trammeled in her legislation in reference to any amount she shall litigate.

I shall not object, for one, to this amendment going out; but yet, as stated by the Senator from Illinois, a majority of the committee thought it was best to put the jurisdiction, as in other cases, upon the amount actually involved, though really it is very difficult, in nine cases out of ten, to tell what is the amount involved.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to supplement the remarks made by my colleague by saying that he is unquestionably right, and I wish he had enforced his view with more vigor, because he is familiar with the practice of patent law. He is unquestionably right in saying that there is great importance in this question in having a uniform rule throughout the United States, and that very serious embarrassments and a multiplication of litigation is apt to come from contradictory decisions in different courts of appeals. So that his suggestion looks to the prevention of litigation. There should be an appeal to one central tribunal, where the lawfulness of a patent may be established once for all. Under any other system there may be half a dozen conflicting decisions, and the patentee then does not know what his rights are. He is either involved in litigation all over the country or he has to abandon a right guaranteed to him by the laws of the United States.

Now, as to the matter in controversy, there are a multitude of patents in which the royalty obtained by the patentee is perhaps five or ten or fifteen or twenty or fifty cents. He is threatened by trespassers, and brings a suit. He brings a suit according to the damage in that particular case. He may bring it upon one article, perhaps, or fifty or one hundred. The same trespassers manufacture a thousand articles, we will say. The damage to the patentee is only $100 in such a case. There are very few patents where the royalty runs up to $100, or $500, or $1,000, or $5,000, so that it is next to impossible ever to get a case in the Supreme Court and get this much desired uniformity of ruling throughout the country under this bill as the committee have brought it before us now.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] suggests to me that the matter in controversy is not the number of dollars involved in that particular suit with John Doe, but the existence and validity of a patent which may be worth a million dollars, or may be worth $50,000, nobody knows what.

Mr. PLATT. May I interrupt my colleague?

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. The practice now is largely in this way, not that a suit is brought at law to recover damages for the infringement of a patent, but an injunction suit is brought to determine the validity of the patent. The value of the patent may be $50,000. The petition for an injunction is brought to test the validity of that patent, and very often the damages are merely nominal, and in that case are agreed to be nominal; there never is really any reference to a master to ascertain the amount of damages; so that in the most valuable patent under the practice as it exists to-day the matter in dispute in one view of it might be but a dollar.

Mr. HAWLEY. I sincerely hope the Senate will concur in—I had almost said the suggestion of the two members of the Judiciary Committee rejecting the amendment and leaving the original bill as it was, in which case the court of appeals can certify that a question is involved of sufficient importance to render it proper that the final decision shall be made by the Supreme Court. I think that would be just, and would satisfy every reasonable interest.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I had thought of proposing an amendment to this bill which would answer to some extent the point made by the Senator from Connecticut; but my dislike to meddle with a measure which has been so carefully framed by so distinguished a lawyer and so distinguished a jurist as the gentleman who has this bill in charge made me desist. But it seems to me that this system would be very much improved by a clause in the bill which would authorize the carrying up of questions to the Supreme Court of the United States, when the court of final resort in any two circuits had differed, so that the permanent rule of law established by the circuit court differed in different circuits, that there might be some general provision which in all cases would enable us to have the security of uniformity in the administration of certainly the Federal laws, like the patent law, in all the districts, or the commercial law so far as it is administered by the Supreme Court of the United States. And if this bill remains before the Senate for some time, I wish the honorable Senator who has it in charge would reflect upon the question whether that cannot be provided for a little more than it is now. That would answer the point of the Senator from Connecticut in regard to patent cases.

Mr. HAWLEY. But I submit that the rejection of this amendment would answer it very much better. The suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts would seem to intimate that in order to justify a man's patent, to defend it successfully, he should be required to go through two suits.

Mr. HOAR. No; not of the particular patent.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. To answer my friend from Massachusetts, I do not apprehend that there will ever be any difficulty in relation to different decisions in the different courts. They know very well what is decided; they compare views together as is done by the intermediate courts that have been established in the several States. I have no objection to any provision such as the Senator from Massachusetts suggests. If the general scheme of the bill is correct, the bill was thought to be by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, who did not want any bill at all on the subject, as perfect as it could be made.

I appreciate what has been said by the Senator from Connecticut on the subject of patents and copyrights. Of course, unless the appellate tribunal where there was a difficult question should certify it to the Supreme Court, there would be very many questions arising in patent cases that could not be got to the Supreme Court at all under the limitation of $10,000. There is no doubt of that. There is one argument in favor of cases involving the construction or validity of a patent, or a copyright, being appealed to the Supreme Court, which is this: the United States is the grantor; and on that account the Senator from Arkansas, who was directed to report this bill, and some others of the committee, thought that this amendment ought not to be made, but a majority of the committee agreed to it, and those gentlemen will give their views on the subject. Of course we ask that the bill shall be adopted as it is, but if this question comes up separately individual action is free.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, without questioning the propriety of what is in common language called giving the amendment away by the Senator who has charge of this bill, and who announces that although the majority of the committee concurred in the amendment, yet really upon the whole he is disposed to think that perhaps it might as well be abandoned, in which he is joined by the Senator from Arkansas, who adds the force of his great example to the illustrious precept of the Senator from Illinois——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Senator from Arkansas has charge of the bill. He reported it.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Illinois introduced it and made the principal speech upon it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Senator from Arkansas reported it.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Illinois is the author and promoter and finisher, if I may so say, of the scheme. But passing that, I wish to ask what there is of peculiar sanctity, what there is of peculiar qualification about a suit for the infringement of a patent right or a copyright that separates it from any other property which may be the subject of litigation? A patent right of course is to a certain extent an impalpable and imponderable thing; it is something that is a direct emanation from the intellect; and the same may be said of a copyright which an author obtains for the production of his brain in the way of a book, or a poem, or a piece of music; but that does not in law separate it from any other property that is tangible and ponderable, that can be weighed and measured and divided and apprehended by the senses.

The majority of the committee were unable to see what reason there was in view of the enormous embarrassment, the complication, the burdens upon industry that are inflicted by the continual multiplication of patents and the vexations attending their enforcement and the attempts to evade their infringement, that rendered it desirable or proper that suits for the infringement of patent rights and copyrights should be segregated from the great mass of litigation that is brought to enforce rights in courts of justice; and I have yet to hear an argument presented by either of the Senators from Connecticut who oppose this amendment, or by the Senator from Illinois or the Senator from Arkansas who give away the amendment, that is in any sense whatever a justification of the course that is proposed.

I hope, sir, before this matter is passed upon, in view of the weight that has been given to this, what may be called backing down on the part of the most prominent members of the committee, that we shall hear some argument advanced, some justification why a man who owns a patent right or a man who owns a copyright should not be subjected to the same rules of law that govern the man who owns a horse, or a case of boots, or any other article of property that may be a subject of litigation.

As a matter of fact this whole question of patent right and copyright is surrounded by too many complications already. There is an attempt on the part of law-makers and legislators to protect these men who are laying burdens upon the industry and upon the development of the industrial resources of this country, and when it is seriously urged here that there is something peculiarly sacred, sacrosanct, about a patent right or a copyright as differing from any other species of property, I hope the Senate will pause before they fall in in consequence of the suggestions made by the Senators from Illinois and Arkansas. I hope certainly they will not do it without some reasons being presented or some argument being offered why it is necessary that this class of property owners should be protected by some peculiar guardianship of a statute like this which is now before the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. May I ask the Senator from Kansas what he understands by this section 10 as to the question of whether if it passes with the amendment a patent-right case may go to the Supreme Court of the United States upon a certification "that the adjudication involves a legal question of sufficient importance to require that the final decision thereof should be made by the Supreme Court?"

Mr. INGALLS. That is what we agreed to strike out.

Mr. PLATT. But I find in section 10 from line 9 onward that appeals may be had to the Supreme Court of the United States "where the matter in controversy exceeds the sum or value of $10,000, exclusive of costs, or where the adjudication involves a question upon the construction of the Constitution or the construction or the validity of a treaty or a law of the United States, or where the court shall certify that the adjudication involves a legal question of sufficient importance to require that the final decision thereof should be made by the Supreme Court."

I had supposed that the effect of this amendment was that that provision should not apply in a patent case, so that instead of any efforts here to give patent cases an advantage which other cases do not possess, it was the effort of the committee to put them in a different category from that of other property. That is what I understood. I do not know but that the Senator understands the construction of it to be different.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Oh, no; that is not the meaning at all. The language—

Where the court shall certify that the adjudication involves a legal question of sufficient importance to require that the final decision thereof should be made by the Supreme Court—applies to the cases of patents as well as others.

Mr. INGALLS. There is no discrimination against patents and copyrights.

Mr. PLATT. But the committee, in striking out the clause proposed by this amendment to be put out, strikes out a provision that "the court of appeals shall certify that a question is involved of sufficient importance to render it proper that the final decision thereof should be made by the Supreme Court." Under the bill as it stood no patent case could go to the Supreme Court unless the court of appeals certified that a question of sufficient importance was involved to take it there. That has been stricken out, for what purpose I do not know.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The purpose was this: in patent right and copyright cases in equity a review may be had without regard to the sum or value in dispute of the questions both of law and fact. We are making a new law. The court of appeals is to be the final judge of the facts entirely; it finds the facts, and upon that finding, as the original bill was, an appeal might be had to the Supreme Court without regard to the amount in controversy, provided "that the court of appeals shall certify that a question is involved of sufficient importance to render it proper;" so that a frivolous case should not go there. But the committee decided to strike that out, and provide that the laws as they now exist with reference to cases that may go before the Supreme Court without regard to the amount in controversy shall continue, except in patent and copyright cases; and those shall not go without regard to that amount. That is the amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from Kansas perhaps forgets—he appears to—that the wisdom of our patent laws and our system on that subject has been established and justified by the legislation and practice of the country for some eighty or ninety years. I think it is rather late now to argue that it is not well to give patents for inventions.

Mr. INGALLS. I did not say so.

Mr. HAWLEY. I thought the Senator did; I thought he seemed to intimate that on the whole it was doubtful whether our patent system was wise.

Mr. INGALLS. I think its administration is exceedingly injurious and burdensome, and that it requires very important revisions.

Mr. HAWLEY. He made this remark: "In view of the burdens patents imposed." I do not know what burdens they impose particularly. If a valuable improvement be made, no citizen need buy it unless he can make money by buying it. If there be an improvement in reapers, in a mowing-machine, in any one of the ten thousand fields of industry, no citizen of the United States is under any obligation or necessity to impose upon himself any burden whatever, but he looks at the new machine, he sees it costs perhaps fifty cents more than the old one, and that it is a great improvement, and that he can make the fifty cents in a week or a day or an hour, perhaps, and he buys it. I do not see where the burden comes in there. After a certain limited time the patent becomes common property and the country is benefited.

So during these ninety years invention after invention has been heaped in and heaped into the common fund of the wealth of this country, until our extraordinary, our marvelous progress in manufactures and in agriculture is due very largely to the great ingenuity of our people. We have a better patent system than they have in any other country, one better devised, and one cheaper, so that the poor mechanic can get a patent for $25 or $50 expense. The upshot of it has been an enormous benefit to the country.

The Senator asks why they should have peculiar privileges. Sir, we are not asking for peculiar privileges; we are only asking for the common privilege of having a patent granted by the United States decided in the highest court of appeal. The Senator sees perfectly well how impossible it is in advance to state precisely the value of the matter in controversy, a mere song we may say, and yet there have been mere songs of four, six, or eight lines that have brought a man fifty or one hundred thousand dollars.

There was no burden imposed on the community; nobody was required to pay for a copy of that song; but yet it was so fascinating to the general popular ear that the people bought it by the millions, and the penny apiece that went to the writer made him a fortune. Suppose a suit arises, suppose an injunction is sought against a rival publisher in a matter of a mere song, how are we to say that there are $10,000 involved?

Mr. INGALLS. Unless we can, why should we say that he shall have the right to go to the Supreme Court any more than the man who owns a horse worth $100, or a grindstone worth fifty cents?

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not say in advance that he should have the right to go to the Supreme Court, but I say the original draft of this bill was just and right in saying:

Provided, That the court of appeals shall certify that a question is involved of sufficient importance to render it proper that the final decision thereof should be made by the Supreme Court.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator does not seem to be aware that that right exists now under this bill with this clause stricken out.

Mr. HAWLEY. I doubt very much whether it does.

Mr. INGALLS. It was the intention of the committee to have it so, and if not we shall be glad to insert it. The Senator will observe the previous provision, that a question of law in a patent and copyright case can be reserved as well as in any other case.

Mr. HAWLEY. The phrase referred to by the Senator is this:

Or where the adjudication involves a question upon the construction of the Constitution—

Which would hardly arise in the case of the song I speak of—or the construction or the validity of a treaty—

Certainly not there—or a law of the United States—

The case I suppose touches the validity of a law of the United States, or its construction—or where the court shall certify that the adjudication involves a legal question of sufficient importance to require that the final decision thereof should be made by the Supreme Court.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is it.

Mr. HAWLEY. They can in that case go to the Supreme Court?

Mr. INGALLS. They can, irrespective of value.

Mr. McMILLAN. If the Senator from Connecticut will recur to the clause in the original bill stricken out here, he will see that it refers to the review of patent and copyright cases both upon questions of law and of fact; so that if the certificate is made that there are questions involved of importance it takes to the Supreme Court questions both of law and of fact, and makes the Supreme Court a court of review as to both fact and law. In other cases the court of appeals decide the questions of fact, and their decision is conclusive.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator does not quite state it, I think. As the bill is with the clause stricken out to which the Senator refers, as the bill is left by the committee, the question must be certified by the lower court to be of sufficient importance to warrant its revision by the Supreme Court. In that case, though there may be twenty questions of law in the case, only that one question of law so certified goes up, leaving all the other questions of law as well as the questions of fact settled. In the cases provided for by the clause stricken out, if the court of appeals say that there is one question in the case of sufficient importance to be revised, the Supreme Court have not only got to revise that question, but have got to revise the whole law and facts of the case.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That is the difference. So far as the report of the committee is concerned, it seems to me that the bill as a whole must be taken as the report of the committee, and that if the committee, or any member of the committee, have abandoned a portion of it, it leaves the whole bill without any report from the committee sustaining it, because so far as I am concerned my vote in favor of this bill was given as it is amended, and if any portion of it is to be abandoned I shall feel at liberty to vote as I please in regard to the whole bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The bill is of no more concern to me than it is to anybody else, but if the Senator supposes that I have abandoned it he is mistaken. That I was originally in favor of the clause now proposed to be changed is very evident, because I introduced the bill in that shape; but I intend to support the bill as it was reported.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I was not in the Chamber when the Senator from Illinois' remarks were made upon which the Senator from Kansas made his remarks, but if the Senator from Kansas is correct, and any of the members of the committee have abandoned the report so far as this amendment is concerned, and this amendment be not sustained by the Senate, I shall feel at liberty to vote as I please on the final passage of the bill.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. HAWLEY. I did not intend to abandon the floor; and if gentlemen will allow me a moment longer, I shall be through. I was interrupted by Senators making inquiries. I am willing to accept the favorable construction suggested by the Senator from Kansas and the Senators from Minnesota, and I trust that the bill will be found no more mischievous than they intimate in their explanation; but I confess that I am a little suspicious when I find the distinguished Senator who has just spoken saying that if this amendment in italics shall be rejected by the Senate he will feel at liberty to oppose the whole bill, a bill of vast national importance, organizing a court of appeals, greatly needed; and yet he says this amendment is of no particular consequence so far as my point is concerned, but if it is lost he will be at liberty to oppose the whole bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator will permit me to suggest in this connection that this very amendment affects materially the power of the court of appeals and the power of the Supreme Court as organized under this bill. That is the reason why it affects my action on the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I very much prefer the bill as offered by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. BUTLER. It is perfectly obvious that we shall not be able to get through with this bill this evening, and if the Senator in charge of it will permit, I should like now to present two amendments to the bill and have them printed, so that they can be considered to-morrow morning. The Senator from Alabama has suggested a very important amendment, in fact has suggested another bill as a substitute for the bill under consideration. It seems to me that it would be very proper that the Senate should have the benefit of that amendment, and I should like very much before the amendments of the committee have been disposed of to give notice of these amendments of mine and have them printed, and then move an adjournment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments may be received informally and be ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from South Carolina allow me to say to him, before he moves an adjournment, that I desire to ask a favor of the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. I certainly shall not press the motion now. If it is agreeable to the Senator from Arkansas, I will offer these amendments with a view of having them printed after they are read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendments will be read and then ordered to be printed.

Mr. VEST. I suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that I have an amendment which I shall ask to have printed.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to have my proposed amendments read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be read by the Secretary.

The ACTING SECRETARY. The Senator from South Carolina proposes the following amendment:

The circuit judges (the present incumbents in office and those to be appointed under this bill) shall succeed each other in rotation on the courts of appeals herein provided for in the nine circuits as now organized; and the Supreme Court of the United States shall make the necessary rules and regulations to effectuate such rotation, but no circuit judge shall serve longer than twelve months consecutively in any circuit.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire that to come in at the end of section 3 as a part of that section. Then I propose an additional section to come in at the end of the bill, which I hope will now be read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

SEC. —. That after the establishment of the courts of appeal herein provided for, there shall be no additional appointments to the Supreme Court of the United States until the number of said Supreme Court shall be reduced to six members.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. These proposed amendments will be ordered to be printed.

Mr. VEST. I submit the amendment which I send to the desk to be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. At the end of section 3 it is proposed to add:

Provided, That no circuit or district judge before whom a cause or question may have been tried or heard in the district court shall sit on the trial or hearing of such cause or question in the court hereby created, and the places of such judge or judges so disqualified shall be filled by the other judges then present, as hereinbefore provided in cases of absence.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask unanimous consent of the Senate to lay aside the pending measure for a moment for the passage of a bill. The Secretary of War has sent to the Senate a communication indicating that Plymouth Harbor, in the State of Massachusetts, is in danger of immediate destruction by the carrying away of some works in that harbor, and suggesting an appropriation of $14,000 to be immediately available, for the purpose of saving the harbor. I ask that the bill may be read and the letter from the Secretary of War. The whole case is very brief and very plain. I desire to have the bill passed and sent to the House.

Mr. GARLAND. Before that is taken up, I wish to say that I have no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina to have the various amendments which he offers and also that of the Senator from Missouri printed. I should like any other Senator who has an amendment to offer to present it now, so that it may be printed.

Mr. CALL. I submit an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read and ordered to be printed.

The ACTING SECRETARY. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] is, in section 8, [9,] to strike out, after the word "cases," in line 6, to the word "judge," in line 9.

Mr. GARLAND. I am willing now that this order of business shall be laid aside informally for the purpose indicated by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be laid aside informally. Is there objection to considering the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. INGALLS. Is it reported from any committee?

Mr. HOAR. After the bill has been read for information I will state the point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for information.

PLYMOUTH HARBOR.

Mr. HOAR asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1820) for the protection of Plymouth Harbor, Massachusetts; which was read the first time by its title and the second time at length.

Mr. HOAR. The Secretary of War has sent in a communication to which my attention and that of my colleague has been called by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce. Long Beach, in Plymouth Harbor, is a very long strip of land nearly invisible at high water, but which furnishes the entire protection to that harbor. That beach is protected in its turn by an old work partly of rubble and partly of wood. That has been carried away by a violent storm, and the danger, according to the Secretary of War and the report of the engineer, is that the whole harbor will be destroyed unless this little sum can be appropriated and expended at once. I ask for the reading of the Secretary's letter. The bill has not been before the committee, but the chairman of the committee and the Senator from Michigan of the committee have had their attention called to it. I ask for the reading of the letter of the head of the War Department.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, April 7, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a letter from the Chief of Engineers of the 5th instant, and accompanying copy of one from Colonel George Thom, Corps of Engineers, reporting serious damage to the work of the United States for the protection of the outer end of Long Beach, Plymouth Harbor, Massachusetts.

It is represented that the preservation of this harbor depends entirely upon the maintenance of Long Beach, and any action of the sea thereon likely to seriously injure it should be at once arrested.

The cost of the required protection is estimated at $14,000, and an appropriation by Congress of which amount is respectfully recommended.

Very respectfully,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

Hon. S. J. R. MCMILLAN,
Chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Now read the accompanying report from the engineers.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., April 5, 1882.

SIR: I beg leave to submit the inclosed copies of a letter dated March 30, from Colonel George Thom, Corps of Engineers, reporting serious damage to the work of the United States for the protection of the outer end of Long Beach, Plymouth Harbor, Massachusetts.

The preservation of this harbor depends entirely upon the maintenance of Long Beach, and any action of the sea thereon likely to seriously injure it should be at once arrested. I have accordingly to recommend that the subject be brought to the attention of the Committees on Commerce of the Senate and House of Representatives through their respective presiding officers.

The estimated cost of the required protection is $14,000.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. G. WRIGHT,
Chief of Engineers, Brigadier and Brevet Major-General.

Hon. ROBERT T. LINCOLN, Secretary of War.

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Portland, Maine, March 30, 1882.

GENERAL: I have the honor to report that owing to the several storms that have occurred during the past winter, and more especially the unusually severe storms that occurred on the 22d of February, and on the 17th and 18th of March, much damage has been done to the Government works built for the protection and preservation of the outer (northern) end of Long Beach. This damage has been for the most part sustained by the crib-work, bulkhead, and jetties, (some of which were built about fifteen years ago,) which have become rotten and broken up, and in consequence the beach has been much abraided and weakened to an extent greatly endangering its preservation.

Long Beach is a narrow strip of land that extends about two and three-quarter miles out from the main land in a northwesterly direction, nearly parallel to the shore of the town of Plymouth, Massachusetts, and distant from it about one mile, and affords to the harbor its only protection from easterly storms, so that the existence of the harbor depends entirely upon the protection and preservation of this beach.

The works hitherto built for this purpose by the United States Government have consisted of wooden bulkheads of various forms and jetties which fully answered the purpose for which they were intended up to the present time, except on the outer (northern) extremity of Long Beach, where it is the most exposed to storms. During the past few years this perishable crib-work has (in part) been replaced by a rubble-stone bulkhead and jetties, in view of their probable early destruction. Owing to the present condition of these wooden bulkheads and jetties, it has become necessary, in my opinion, to continue the stone bulkhead along the western shore of Long Beach for an additional distance of 1,000 feet, so as to protect in a more permanent manner this the present weakest portion of that beach. It is, moreover, highly important that this work should be built at once, to prevent the further destruction of the beach to which it is now much exposed.

This work would require about 5,000 tons of rubble-stone, (large and small,) the estimated cost of which placed in position is, at $2.50 per ton, $12,500; adding for engineering and other contingent expenses, say $1,500—total, $14,000.

I would respectfully recommend that the attention of Congress be called to this matter, in order that provision may be made for completing this work as soon as practicable.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. THOM,
Colonel of Engineers, Bvt. Brig. Gen., U. S. A.

Brig. Gen. H. G. WRIGHT,
Chief of Engineers, U. S. Army, Washington, D. C.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. PLUMB. I object.

Mr. HOAR. Why?

Mr. PLUMB. I will state my ground. If one river and harbor is a bad thing, as we have been told, I think thirty or forty are so much worse. This has remained one month awaiting the slow arrival of the War Department at some conclusion about its necessity; it can wait twenty-four hours, until the proper committee of this body can examine it. At all events it cannot pass now, if one objection will carry it over.

Mr. HOAR. If my honorable friend from Kansas will permit me to make a statement, this harbor which has so much of interesting historical associations, to say nothing else, is a very important harbor of refuge for vessels bound to the port of Boston. They run in there frequently in great storms. Its final destruction occurred in the storm of the 17th of March, only a short time since.

Mr. PLUMB. About six weeks ago.

Mr. HOAR. The chief officer who makes this report desires that the appropriation be made at once. A personal examination of the harbor has been made and of the estimate of the engineer, and now this comes in, by special message, from the Secretary of War. It is called to our attention by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, who called the attention of the Massachusetts Senators to it. The bill has the support of the members of the Committee on Commerce who have seen the bill. I hope my friend will permit it to go through, and not require the Senate to go over it again. It is a very small sum.

Mr. VEST. I should like very much to say a word. I think the precedent is certainly objectionable. I am a member of the Committee on Commerce, and I never heard of this bill until it was introduced here. I understand the chairman and the Senator from Michigan saw it, but that is not the way to do committee work. I do not know but what the bill is all right.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Missouri will permit me to interrupt him for a moment. This communication from the Secretary of War was made on the motion of the Department, sent to the Committee on Commerce, and was laid before the committee by the chairman, and the direction was given that the papers be communicated to the Senators from Massachusetts that they might be advised what course to take.

Mr. VEST. I understand that, but this bill has never been before the committee.

Mr. McMILLAN. No, sir; the bill was never before the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. The report was made on the 7th of April.

Mr. RANSOM. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts to have the bill referred to the Committee on Commerce. I favor the bill from what I have heard of it, but at the same time it ought to be referred.

Mr. McMILLAN. If the Senator from Massachusetts will have the bill referred, it can be considered on Thursday morning when the committee meets.

Mr. PLUMB. The letter of the Secretary of War has been in the hands of the chairman of the committee almost four weeks, and I think after the committee have had this communication for four weeks without acting on it, it is rather trenching on the Senate to ask it to act on it in a few minutes.

Mr. HOAR. Let the matter be referred.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUTLER. Our friends are evidently becoming very much excited, and, in the interest of peace, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before putting the motion to adjourn the Chair will lay before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 880) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Hannibal, in the State of Missouri, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill to establish a court of appeals being before the Senate as the unfinished business, the Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and fifty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 2, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings having been partly read,

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois, said: I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with. It is simply a repetition to the end; and nobody listens to it.

There being no objection, the further reading of the Journal was dispensed with.

The Journal was then approved.

PUBLIC BUILDING, QUINCY, ILLINOIS.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4176) for the erection of a public building at Quincy, Illinois, and that the same be now put on its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the post-office, United States courts, custom-house, bonded warehouse, internal-revenue offices, and other Government offices, at the city of Quincy, Illinois. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $175,000: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than forty feet, including streets and alleys; and no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Illinois shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owners thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. HASKELL. I do not think we ought to take up by unanimous consent bills for public buildings.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. HASKELL. I think the House is now too thin to take up a bill of this kind. Nobody knows anything about it.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. This bill is in precisely the same form as the other bills for public buildings which have been passed by the House. The committee adopted a form, and has not varied from it in any bill reported.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Can we not hear the report read, the right to object being reserved?

The SPEAKER. The right to object will be reserved until the report has been read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 218) for the erection of a public building at Quincy, Illinois, beg leave to report that they have had the same under consideration, and report in lieu thereof the substitute herewith presented.

They find that Quincy is a growing and prosperous city, located in the midst of the most densely populated, fertile, and productive portions of the State of Illinois, and is widely known as one of the most beautiful and promising cities of the West, admired by all for the solidity, permanence, and attractiveness of its improvements. It contains within its present confined limits 30,000 inhabitants, besides a large suburban population doing business in said city.

The city of Quincy is penetrated by the following lines of railroad: the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy; the Quincy, Carthage and Burlington; the Quincy, Alton and Saint Louis; the Quincy, Missouri and Pacific; the Keokuk, Quincy and Saint Louis; the Wabash, Saint Louis and Pacific, and the Hannibal and Saint Joseph, making in all seven railroads.

The products of the shops, mills, foundries, machine-shops, and other manufacturing establishments within the boundaries of said city amounted, during the year 1881, to a fraction less than $15,000,000. Its jobbing sales of foreign and domestic goods (other than such as were manufactured in the city) amounted for the same year to $14,745,000. The revenue paid to the Government of the United States during the same period amounted to $1,188,669.13. The annual rental for post-office and other necessary offices is $2,500.

While a less sum than that asked for by the bill might serve the purposes of to-day, and accommodate the present population and business, we must bear in mind that such a city as Quincy has an assured future increase of population and business, and it is a wise economy, fully proven by experience, that in providing buildings for the use and convenience of the Government, the probable future population and prospective wants of new and growing cities is entitled to consideration and weight [illegible] that in meeting a present want we may anticipate and provide for a not distant future necessity.

The committee recommend the passage of the substitute herewith presented.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. In view of the policy adopted yesterday, I will not object to this bill coming before the House, but I shall insist upon a vote on the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, there were—ayes 79, noes 7; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think a quorum should vote on a bill of this kind.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois, and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 140, noes 12.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SCRANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4178) to authorize the purchase of a site and the erection of a suitable building for a post-office and other Government offices in the city of Scranton, Pennsylvania, and that it be put on its passage at this time.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. PAGE. Let me appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his demand for the regular order of business so I may call up the Senate amendments to the Chinese bill. It will not take but a moment, as the amendments have all been printed. I shall move concurrence in all the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded.

Mr. PAGE. I hope it will not be insisted on. It will not take a moment to concur in the amendments of the Senate to the Chinese bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw my demand for the regular order for that purpose, and that only, and shall renew the demand as soon as it is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraws the demand for the regular order, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from California for the purpose of calling up the amendments of the Senate to the Chinese bill.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. SCRANTON] has the floor, and his bill should be first disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The regular order was called against that bill.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demanded the regular order, but afterward yielded to me to call up for concurrence the Senate amendments to the Chinese bill.

Mr. O'NEILL. I ask my colleague from the third district to withdraw his demand for the regular order, so my other colleague [Mr. SCRANTON] may proceed with the consideration of his bill for the erection of a public building in the city of Scranton, Pennsylvania.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, it is time to stop these unanimous consents, unless there can be some fairness in the recognition of individuals.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will resume their seats.

Mr. HATCH. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIGGS] that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCRANTON] was first recognized, but the demand for the regular order of business took him off the floor.

Mr. HATCH. I ask whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania can object conditionally?

Mr. BRIGGS. I say that to permit the gentleman from California to proceed now would not be doing impartial and exact justice to other members, for he has been recognized frequently, while other members have not yet received a single recognition. Unless this favor of recognition can be more fairly and equally distributed I shall have to object to all of them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not mean to intimate the Chair was not fair in his recognition?

Mr. BRIGGS. No, sir.

Mr. HATCH. I wish to know, Mr. Speaker, whether the gentleman demanding the regular order can withdraw that demand conditionally. I hold that when he withdraws his demand for the regular order the recognition is then with the Chair and not with the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdrew my demand for the regular order, because I believed the public interest required the Senate amendments to the Chinese bill should be considered and disposed of, and the bill passed. I gave notice, however, that after that was done I would again call for the regular order of business. That was in no sense a condition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that a conditional withdrawal could not be made; but when the demand for the regular order was withdrawn the gentleman gave notice that he would again call for the regular order as soon as the Chinese bill was disposed of. The Chair then recognized the gentleman from California. As the regular order is again demanded, the Chair will state that the morning hour begins for the reception of reports from committees.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has withdrawn his demand so I may call up the Senate amendments to the Chinese bill.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair understands the gentleman from New Hampshire insists on the regular order.

Mr. BRIGGS. The gentleman from California has been recognized half a dozen times this session while others have not received a single recognition.

Mr. PAGE. I hope the gentleman from New Hampshire will not attempt to cut me off because the regular order was called on him. Yesterday the whole day was taken up in suspending the rules and passing bills for public buildings, all of which I agreed to. Now I ask to proceed to the consideration of some public business, and certainly no one here, I certainly never have, objected to any motion on this floor proceeding in the regular way by unanimous consent. This is an important public business, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw his demand. It will take but a moment to concur in the Senate amendments. I appeal to the gentleman from New Hampshire to withdraw his demand.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from New Hampshire to decline to withdraw his demand for the regular order of business.

Mr. KASSON. As the regular order has been demanded, I now move to dispense with the morning hour so that the House may proceed with the consideration of the tariff-commission bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 104, noes 8.

So the motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish, Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference at the request of my colleague, [Mr. BLACK.]

Mr. REED. And I wish to make a report.

Mr. ANDERSON. I would like to know from the gentleman from Iowa having in charge the tariff-commission bill if he can indicate how much time that tariff-commission bill will take before it is disposed of. I wish to call up for consideration the Agricultural Department bill.

Mr. KASSON. It has been agreed that the continuance of the debate shall not continue beyond three days. If a less time will do I will cheerfully avail myself of the opportunity to demand a vote.

Mr. REED. Cannot the gentleman move that all debate on the question shall be closed at a certain day, so we may have an end of it? I submit it stands now as an incubus to the consideration of all other public business.

PUBLIC BUILDING, HANNIBAL, MISSOURI.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour having been dispensed with, the bill (H. R. No. 880) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Hannibal, in the State of Missouri, comes up as the unfinished business, the pending question being on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HATCH. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to say a word before the previous question is demanded.

Mr. HATCH. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. CANNON. I ask the House to vote down the demand for the previous question, because if members know the facts they certainly will not pass this bill. I only want five minutes.

Mr. HATCH. I will give the gentleman from Illinois five minutes after the previous question is ordered.

Mr. CANNON. Very well.

Mr. KASSON. I rise to a question of order. I made a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider further the tariff-commission bill, and discovered in the midst of the confusion that some question was raised about a previous order of the House. I do not understand that can be in order pending the motion which I have made to go into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa that the motion to go into a Committee of the Whole was not entertained, for the reason that the regular order, which was demanded, takes precedence. The regular order is the bill referred to by the gentleman from Missouri. He now calls up the unfinished business, a bill which had been ordered to its third reading on a previous day, for final action. This bill has been ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, and the question now recurs on its passage. That is the first business in order at this time.

Mr. HATCH. I now demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 78, noes 3.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. HATCH and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; but before announcing the result of the vote in the affirmative, Mr. HOLMAN stated that a quorum having voted he would withdraw the demand for a further count.

So the previous question was ordered.

Mr. HATCH. I yield now five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.]

Mr. CANNON. I would like to have the attention of the House for a few moments. This is a bill for the erection of a public building at Hannibal, Missouri. I do not know whose district it is in. I only know from the report and from the revenues of the post-office there what is required and what we are asked to do. The report in this case is misleading, as I think I can show to the satisfaction of the House. There is no United States court held there.

I believe it is set out in the report that a revenue office is established at that point; and it is further stated that from the date of the passage of the internal-revenue laws the taxes collected at that place amount to in the neighborhood of some three or four millions of dollars. I have not time to read the report which sets forth these different facts, but I refer to it in a general way. It is also stated that in 1877 the postal revenues were $70,000, and a little over that for 1878 and 1879.

The facts are that in 1878, as I have here in a statement from the Sixth Auditor's office, the gross postal receipts in 1878 were only about $13,500; in 1879, $14,000; in 1880, $16,000; in 1881, $17,000; and to make these postal receipts as much as stated in the report, that is, to reach the gross amount of $70,000, they have to take in all the postal money-orders sold there for these years and count them as postal receipts. This letter of the Auditor to which I refer I will incorporate with my remarks, and gentlemen can see the statement for themselves. It is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR OF THE TREASURY FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., April 24, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the gross revenue from postal receipts at Hannibal, Missouri, during the fiscal years named were as follows:

Year ended June 30, 1878	$13,514 68
Year ended June 30, 1879	14,369 63
Year ended June 30, 1880	16,227 97
Year ended June 30, 1881	17,168 96

Respectfully,

J. H. ELA, Auditor.

Hon. JOS. G. CANNON, House of Representatives.

Now, if Hannibal is entitled to a public building, if an expenditure for this purpose shall be made by this Congress, then every city like Decatur, in Illinois, and my own city of Danville, Illinois, and quite generally all the cities in the United States of from six to twelve thousand inhabitants would be entitled to public buildings, and many of them would be clamorous for their erection. We are extravagant enough in the construction of public buildings. Towns that ought to have them, where the public necessities justify the expenditure, certainly deserve consideration; and places where large revenues are collected, where the courts of the United States are held, should be considered in making provision for their accommodation. But I do not believe we are justified in constructing public buildings to accommodate post-offices where the annual gross revenues only amount to $17,000.

Generally I will vote where a United States court is held to erect a public building. The proposed cost of this building is $75,000, and the rent that the Government now pays at Hannibal amounts to only $400 a year. The clerk hire in the post office there amounts to about $2,500 per annum, about the same amount that is paid in other towns of from six to ten thousand people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is not a question of the welfare of the gentleman from Missouri, if it is in his district; nor is it a question of my welfare, if such a building were proposed in my district; nor is it a question of the welfare of the few people who are to be benefited by it, but it is a question of whether we can afford to embark upon a policy that will spend millions from the public Treasury where there is no sufficient public return for it, and where a suitable building for the post-office can be leased at a moderate price.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied the gentleman from Illinois has not taken the pains to acquaint himself fully with the facts to which he invites attention, or he would not have made the statement which he has made on this floor to-day with reference to the public business at Hannibal, Missouri.

The gentleman from Illinois lives about one hundred and twenty-five or one hundred and forty miles east of Hannibal, and ought to have known enough about that section of the country in which he lives to have prevented him from making any such statement. The gentleman has read extracts from a report that was made two years ago. The city of Hannibal is not as large in population as some of the cities that have public buildings granted to them. [Mr. CANNON rose.] I will be willing to answer all the gentleman's questions when I have got through. Let me state my facts. I did not interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Missouri, I am sure, does not want to misrepresent me. I wish to say that I read from the report that accompanies this bill.

Mr. HATCH. I will explain about that to the gentleman before I finish. He is correct, but the statistics were taken from a report made two years ago.

The city of Hannibal to-day, as I am informed by recent letters from the mayor and other officials, is estimated to contain nearly fourteen thousand people.

Mr. HORR. What was its population according to the last census?

Mr. HATCH. I have sent for the report so as to be able to give the exact figures. The census showed a population short of twelve thousand. But we were in the same predicament at Hannibal as the people of Saint Louis were. We had an imperfect census. The vote polled for the last three years in that city shows we were entitled to a population of about fourteen thousand people.

But that is not the point. Hannibal is the third largest mail-distributing point in the State of Missouri. Outside of the city of Saint Louis and Kansas City it handles more mail than any other city in the State; and there is no city in the Mississippi Valley containing its population where the same amount of postal business is done as is done in Hannibal. Twenty-three mail trains come in and go out of that city every twenty-four hours, and the receipts up to the present time show that the office will pay during the present fiscal year $21,000 to the Government.

I have a letter from the Postmaster-General, dated March 11, 1882, giving a detailed statement, an extract from which I will have printed with my remarks, and is as follows:

Our revenue is gradually increasing: January sales, $1,553.70; February sales, $1,858.53; (stamps only, of course;) total, $3,382.23. Add, say, for March, (which is a bad, stormy month,) $1,325, and box-rent already collected, $482, will make a total of gross receipts for this quarter about five thousand two hundred dollars; or for the nine months of the fiscal year of over $15,000. I have the United States assistant treasurer's receipt for $3,305 deposited during January and February, stamps and box-rent. This is healthy growth for "Uncle Samuel."

In addition, I may say that Hannibal is the most important railroad and commercial place of its population upon the Mississippi River. Let me say to my distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. HORR] that Hannibal handles more salt from his State to-day than any single city with the same population in the United States. It distributes more lumber than any other city of its population in the United States. It is the largest lumber distributing point on the Mississippi River between Saint Paul and New Orleans of any city of its population. It handles more of the products of the gentleman's State and of the great Northwest, and handles more coal oil from Ohio and Pennsylvania than any other city of its population in the Mississippi Valley. Its commercial importance should not, therefore, be judged by population alone. I would have been glad if my earnest friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] had asked me for the business statistics of Hannibal. I will publish a statement of these with a memorial from the mayor and city council as part of my remarks. Let me call the attention of the House to a few of them. They are embodied in a letter signed by the mayor of the city, addressed to Captain Mackenzie, the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, in charge of the work of improvement of the Upper Mississippi River and by him forwarded to the War Department.

One hundred and forty millions of feet of lumber were piled there during the last season. Fifteen millions of logs were sawed into lumber there during the last season. Some idea of the railroad business concentrated there may be gained from the fact that last year there passed over the Hannibal bridge 9,901 trains.

Mr. HASKELL. May I ask the gentleman from Missouri a question?

Mr. HATCH. Certainly.

Mr. HASKELL. What does the Government pay of rent per annum?

Mr. HATCH. I thank the gentleman for calling my attention to that. Four years ago the Government of the United States, to its discredit, went into the city of Hannibal, and, in an effort to locate a post-office building, allowed the merchants of the city of Hannibal to raise a bonus, as is stated to me by the postmaster, and the Government accepted a lease and pays the pitiable sum of $400 per annum for a building insufficient and insecure; one that has been condemned by the postal authorities, and the merchants and business men interested in the location on two blocks pay the balance for the Government.

Mr. HASKELL. Is there any other rental paid, except the post-office rental?

Mr. HATCH. There is, I think.

Mr. HASKELL. What is it?

Mr. HATCH. The collector or deputy collector of internal revenue has had an office there ever since the revenue laws have been in operation.

Mr. HASKELL. What rental is paid for his office?

Mr. HATCH. I have a statement from the deputy collector, Mr. Heywood, which I will find in a moment, and print in this connection:

UNITED STATES INTERNAL REVENUE,
DEPUTY COLLECTOR'S OFFICE, THIRD DISTRICT, MISSOURI,
Hannibal, Missouri, February 23, 1880.

DEAR SIR: Being absent from home your letter of the 16th instant has but just come to hand. The statement referred to I most positively mailed to you on the 1st instant. I send you inclosed herewith a "duplicate," as requested. It is impossible for me to furnish you with a statement giving the exact amount collected in this district since the revenue law went into operation, as the records containing that information are at the general office, Louisiana, packed in large boxes with other papers and stored away, with the exception of the last few years; but I can come very near to it, which I think will answer your purpose. If anything more should be wanted that it is in my power to furnish advise me and it shall be promptly sent to you.

From September, 1862, to August, 1865, inclusive, the collections in this district were over $360,000 per annum.

From September, 1865, to September, 1868, inclusive, over $600,000 per annum.

From October, 1868, to June 30, 1879, over $300,000 per annum.

In other words, this district since the revenue law went into operation has paid over six and one-quarter millions of dollars to the Government, of which at least four and one-quarter millions was collected by me at Hannibal.

Hoping the above may prove satisfactory. I am yours truly,

C. P. HEYWOOD.

Hon. W. H. HATCH, Washington, D. C.

In addition I desire to state, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] a sub-committee of the Judiciary Committee of the House for the second time have reported favorably a bill to the committee giving to the city of Hannibal two terms of the United States district and circuit courts for the northern division of the eastern district of Missouri. That bill will be reported as soon as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCOID] can get the floor for that purpose, and will go upon the Calendar. It has been reported the second time, as stated, and I am satisfied the House, when the bill is considered, will pass it. That division embraces seventeen counties; is larger than six States of the Union in the number of square miles; larger in population than six States of the Union; larger in population than any single Territory of the United States where district and circuit courts are now held.

Mr. HASKELL. I would like to have my friend from Missouri state to the House the total amount of rent paid in Hannibal by the Government, so that the House may see what sum of money may be invested in a building the interest on which at 4 per cent. would be equivalent to the saving in rent that would be effected by the erection of a building.

Mr. HATCH. I propose to publish, as before stated, a statement signed by Mr. C. P. Heywood, the deputy collector at Hannibal, in which will probably be the information the gentleman desires. Since the internal-revenue law went into operation that district has paid to the Government over six and a quarter millions of dollars. He does not give the amount paid for rent, but I will endeavor to obtain it and publish it in my remarks.

I want to state this to the House: that the present postmaster at Hannibal and other well-informed citizens have written to me that as soon as the Government lease expires it will be utterly impossible for the Government to rent a building in Hannibal suitable for the post-office at less that $2,000 or $3,000 a year; that unless some public-spirited man shall erect a building there will not be one there suitable for the purpose at a less rent than the amount he names. Two years ago, in his letter which I will print as a part of my remarks, the postmaster said that "a building suitable for our wants, if it could be obtained and a contract made for a term of years, could probably be obtained for say $1,200 to $1,500."

The rapid increase of business and consequent demand for business houses since that time, with increase in rents generally—I am sure a suitable and safe building could not now be had for any such price.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 19, 1880.

MY DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of inquiry of this date, and in answer thereto would say that the present rental paid by the Post-Office Department for the building now occupied by us is $400 per annum. The low rent at which it was obtained being the chief and only recommendation for present location, and this figure only being obtained in consequence of the owners of property adjacent to our present location giving the owner a bonus, or rather supplementing the amount paid by the Government by enough to make what would be a fair rental even for the present building, which is wholly unsuitable for our wants for the reason that we have only the first or lower story, the second story being a "tenement story" and the occupants of questionable character, that we are required to have persons sleep in the office, which cuts off a small bed-room, and with six employes in a building about eighteen by sixty feet and a mailing department requiring almost all the time two men, and storage room required for delayed mail received from our trunk lines, it is utterly impossible to transact the business properly and accurately. And at the present time we have twelve mail-trains to arrive and thirteen to depart daily, except Sunday, when the number is reduced about one-half. Since my connection with the office it has been burglarized twice in the past year, greatly endangering the safety of Government funds and property, which you will observe is not far from $200,000 per annum, including receipts and payments. A building suitable for our wants, if it could be obtained and a contract made for a term of years, could probably be obtained for say $1,200 to $1,500 per annum, but considering that lumber and stone are two of our principal articles of export, it seems that it would be economy on the part of the Government to erect its own building, in which all of its business could be transacted.

I have the honor to be, colonel, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. F. CHAMBERLAIN,
Acting Postmaster, Hannibal, Missouri.

Hon. W. H. HATCH, M. C.,
Twelfth District, Missouri.

I do not know why, after the passage of so many bills for the construction of public buildings, (and I do not criticise any of them,) I should take up the time of this House any longer. I certainly have stated facts enough to induce a majority of this House to vote for the passage of this bill, and unless the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] desires some time I will call a vote on the bill.

To the honorable Mayor and City Council of the city of Hannibal:

GENTLEMEN: Your committee, to whom was referred the matter of the erection of a Government building at this place, after a due consideration beg leave to submit for your consideration and approval the following memorial, and ask that it be forwarded to our Representative in Congress, Hon. W. H. HATCH, in Washington, District of Columbia, to be laid before Congress, and that he be and is hereby instructed to use all honorable means in his power, as also his influence and eloquence with Congress and the committee to secure such an appropriation as will be adequate to erect such a Government building in the city of Hannibal, Missouri, as is absolutely necessary to the growing interests and demands of Northeast Missouri.

The city of Hannibal, Marion County, Missouri, is located about one hundred and twenty miles north of Saint Louis and about sixty miles south of Keokuk, Iowa. The counties of Clark, Lewis, and Marion are north, and the counties of Ralls, Pike, and Lincoln are south of Hannibal on the Mississippi River. Three counties to the west of these six counties form or constitute the wealth, power, and strength of Northeast Missouri.

No section or equal portion of country in the United States is superior in fertility and productiveness of soil, alluvial plains, abundance of timber, water and pasturage, or have a more healthy congenial climate.

The vast resources of Northeast Missouri are rapidly developing, and the production of corn, wheat, oats, and other cereals, the great droves of horses, mules, cattle, sheep, swine, raised and shipped yearly are simply enormous. The counties of Marion and Ralls alone show per returns: 64,716 swine, 33,500 neat cattle, 24,378 sheep, 12,969 horses, and 3,498 mules, about four million bushels corn, and one and one-half million bushels wheat. To these great productions add the counties of Clark, Scotland, Schuyler, Adair, Knox, Lewis, Shelby, Linn, Macon, Monroe, Pike, Audrain, Boone, Callaway, Warren, and Lincoln, with their immense productions and herds of stock, and we can safely assert that Northeast Missouri is not surpassed, if equaled, by any other section of the State of Missouri, or the United States.

On the west bank of the Mississippi River, on the east and nearly center north and south in North Missouri, in Marion County, near Ralls County line, stands the city of Hannibal, with about fourteen thousand inhabitants, the principal and most important city in Northeast Missouri, and the shipping point for this vast territory and far beyond to the west. Hannibal as a city is protected by an efficient fire department against fire; a well organized police force, preservers of law or order; the city is lighted by gas and has water-works (just finishing) on both the reservoir and Holly system plan; a telephone exchange and street railway. One of the finest and best hotels is now being completed, equal to any in the West (now finished.) Improvements are made in all parts of the city, and as a business point or center Hannibal stands unrivaled in this section of Missouri. As a lumber market Hannibal excels any other city north of Saint Louis. Actual figures for the past year show receipts of 124,630,145 feet of lumber, 55,437,000 feet of shingles, 33,657,000 laths, and sash and blinds to the amount of $120,000, sufficient to load 13,628 cars. Employment is given to 821 men, and wages paid amounting to $326,800, in our lumber business. Two hundred thousand barrels salt, 1,250,000 gallons oil, 230,000 barrels of superior white lime, made here; 200,000 barrels of choice flour, manufactured by three of the best flouring mills out of the wheat raised in this section. And all the above distributed from Hannibal. Cattle, horses, mules, sheep, and swine are shipped from Hannibal by river and rail, and about twenty-five thousand hogs slaughtered and packed here.

As a railroad center Hannibal stands pre-eminent. The old reliable Hannibal and Saint Joseph Railroad, leading two hundred and six miles to the west, the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad to the southwest, the Saint Louis and Keokuk Railroad (short line) south-southwest, the Saint Louis, Keokuk and Northwestern north and south, the Toledo and Wabash to the east, the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad to Chicago north to east, and with the various connections of these railroads, make the city of Hannibal a great distributing point north, south, east, and west.

From the north are received portions of the crops raised in Iowa and Minnesota, in wheat, oats, barley, and potatoes, which are shipped from here west and southwest. Wisconsin sends its fleets of lumber to Hannibal, which are drawn, piled, dried, and shipped rail per to the great West and Texas. From the South groceries and southern fruits and productions are received and sold here or reshipped north and west. From the East salt, coal, oils, and general merchandise are received in large quantities, and shipped to Western Missouri, Nebraska, Kansas, Texas, and other localities. From the West grain, stock, and other productions are received here and shipped to other markets. Thousands of car-loads of cotton and other productions are received from Texas and southwest, thus, like the dial of time, pointing to Hannibal's future.

Northeast Missouri stands unrivaled in all the elements to make a country prosperous and a people happy. The city of Hannibal is the great emporium of Northeast Missouri, and is making giant strides and great efforts to furnish and offer to the people of Northeast Missouri and our neighbors in Illinois every facility to promote their interest and welfare, and to give them a market for all that is produced by honest industry and labor. The city of Hannibal, from its locality, business facilities, and easy access to the various railroads reaching out like fingers from the human hand to all parts of Northeast Missouri and the West, has a right, and may justly claim, for the reasons and facts stated and others not dwelt upon, that the General Government, by a liberal policy toward the people of Northeast Missouri, will appropriate such an amount of money toward the erection of a public Government building in the city of Hannibal as the situation and great importance of Northeast Missouri demands.

A Government building for Government purposes, such as post-office, a collector's office, and a United States district court for this portion of Missouri, would greatly facilitate and promote business and the interests of our people.

The importance of a substantial Government building in the city of Hannibal for the purposes stated, namely, a United States district court, collector's (assistant) office, and other public offices, and the great need of a new, safe, and secure post-office, as is ably shown by Captain Chamberlain, assistant postmaster, in the annexed report as to the amount and volume of business done at the present insecure building used as a post-office.

Respectfully submitted,

W. B. DRESCHER, Mayor.

HANNIBAL, MO., January 30, 1880.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request, I have the honor to herewith give you statement of the business of this office for the year 1879.

I would say, however, that a full idea of the large amount of business done in this office (other than that represented by dollars and cents) cannot be accurately given, for the reason that in dispatching to and receiving mail from twenty-two trains per day, with delayed matter to be worked almost daily, no opportunity is afforded for giving actual number of pieces handled. I might institute a favorable comparison in this respect with offices of much larger pretensions who handle less matter, either in number of pieces, pouches, or canvas sacks, than we do, and where good buildings have been erected, and every facility given for the transaction of the postal business. I would especially call your attention to the increase of receipts of this office, from all sources, in 1879 over the two, or, in fact, any previous years, but only 1877 and 1878 are given.

You will readily agree with me in the statement that our present post-office building is very unsuitable for the business of the office, and was selected almost entirely on the grounds of the lowness of rent, the charge to the Department being only $400 per year, a bonus being given the owner by the persons owning property adjacent to the present location of the office. Not only this, but the story immediately over the office is occupied by private families, greatly increasing the liability to fire, and in many instances, as well known to yourself, the character of the tenants is such that our present location is very unfortunate, both for the Department and the patrons of the office, and most of all to the postmaster, who stands pecuniarily responsible.

I have the honor to be, my dear sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

RICHARD DRANE, Postmaster.

Hon. W. B. DRESCHER, Mayor.

The appended communications explain themselves, namely:

UNITED STATES ENGINEER'S OFFICE.
Rock Island, Illinois, January 11, 1882.

DEAR SIR: You are respectfully requested to furnish this office with some statistics of the business of Hannibal during the year 1881. The information is wanted for our annual report in reference to the improvement of the Mississippi River at Hannibal.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. MACKENZIE,
Captain of Engineers, U. S. A., General Superintendent Upper Mississippi River Improvements.

His Honor the MAYOR, Hannibal, Missouri.

MAYOR'S OFFICE, HANNIBAL, MISSOURI,
January 23, 1882.

DEAR SIR: In obedience to your request of the 11th instant, I inclose you the following statement, which has been somewhat delayed from causes which we could not prevent.

The business of Hannibal for the year 1881 has not been kept with the accuracy of cities which have a board of trade, but in the most important departments the data returned is undoubtedly correct, while that estimated is more likely to be below the truth as omitting important operations.

The annual report of the Hannibal Bridge Company shows that there passed the draw about 370,000,000 feet of manufactured lumber and 24,000,000 feet of logs, of which 140,000,000 have been taken out of this city and 15,000,000 feet manufactured from the logs.

Tabulated, the business of the city will show as follows:

Business.	Firms engaged.	Amount.	Car-loads.	Value.
Saw-mills	1	15,000,000 feet logs	1,500	$300,000
Lumber dealers	9	140,000,000 feet	14,000	2,800,000
Lath dealers	9	75,000,000	1,700	200,000
Shingle dealers	9	50,000,000	700	175,000
Door, sash, and blind dealers	10		100	150,000
Planing-mills	8			175,000

The Mississippi is here spanned by a railroad and wagon bridge and is also crossed by a steam ferry. The land on the opposite side is an immensely fertile bottom, partly protected by a levee which is not adequate for the purpose. It has, however, since its construction, materially deepened the channel and improved navigation in the portion of the river opposite.

The entire city is protected and supplied with water-works situated two hundred and forty feet above the river.

Hannibal has one of the best public houses (hotel) in the State.

Five railroads make this city the terminus of a division, with accommodations for engines and cars. The Hannibal and Saint Joseph Company have here their principal machine shops and general offices, employing four hundred men, and doing a large amount of new work as well as repairs.

The lumber business of the last year would have been materially larger but for the exceptional high water of last fall, which prevented operations for over a month. The only limits which can now be placed on this business are the opportunities and facilities for handling the lumber, as the railroad transportation from here to the West and Southwest is less than from any other point on the river.

For the same reason this has become a large depot for putting up ice, which industry will be largely increased.

The amount of wheat consumed here was between six hundred thousand and seven hundred thousand bushels.

Ralls and Marion Counties, in Missouri, corner here, while Pike County, in Illinois, is directly opposite. By the last census these three counties raised nearly two million bushels of wheat, and its quality is not excelled. Much of this is marketed here and much more would be with improved facilities. There is one elevator here for handling grain by cars or river, capacity about two hundred and fifty thousand bushels, with two smaller ones on this side of the river and one directly opposite.

This has been made the principal depot from which salt and coal is distributed to the West and Southwest.

Some idea of the railroad business centered here may be gained from the fact that last year there passed over the Hannibal bridge 9,101 trains, of which eight were regular daily passenger trains and the rest were freight. For more than a month this business was mostly cut off by unusually high water. The 6,000 freight trains passing over the bridge were all of the Wabash Railway and would make over 100,000 cars, while nearly or quite as many more were handled by the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy and Keokuk and Saint Louis roads that did not pass over the bridge. The earnings of the several roads west of the river on their freight business to and from Hannibal are thought to be not less than $2,000,000 yearly, the greater portion of which originated or ended here.

The nature of the business is largely such as depends upon the port and river facilities for its profitable handling. With a good harbor and an improved river a very large portion of the produce west of us could be brought here and stored or handled and shipped south to or past Saint Louis for less than the cost for yard-room and switching at that point.

The business of Saint Louis has already outgrown her facilities for handling, and railroad freights are in a chronic state of blockade, which must soon seek relief by other routes. Some will seek the river at Memphis, while much of this business may be best accommodated at Hannibal.

All of which is most respectfully submitted.

Yours, truly,

JOSEPH ROWE, Mayor.

A. MACKENZIE,
Captain of Engineers, U. S. A., General Superintendent Upper Mississippi River Improvements, Rock Island.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. On this question of the propriety of erecting a public building at the city of Hannibal, Missouri, I confess there may be a difference of opinion. I do not regard it as one of the strongest and most meritorious cases which have been reported from our committee. But this bill has been favorably reported by the majority of the committee, has been placed on the Calendar of the House, and now in the pending discussion I desire to say a word or two in reply to the animadversions which have been made upon the action of the committee, and upon the action of the House, which has within the last few weeks almost unanimously indorsed our committee.

And first, I do not agree with my friend from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] when he intimates that the only question to be considered by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is the question of rental, the amount of rent now paid by the United States Government for such rooms as may be occupied by its officers at the present time. That is not a fair test, as I think I can show the House in a very few minutes.

I have a city in my own district which now leases the finest room in the city for the Government post-office at the nominal rent of $1 a year. That lease will soon expire. Does any gentleman on this floor suppose that that lease can be renewed indefinitely for $1 a year?

Mr. CANNON. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. In one moment, when I have finished my statement.

Mr. CANNON. It is right in that line.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I say that the temptation offered United States officials to locate the post-office where it will benefit not the community at large perhaps so much as a few merchants and a few leading business men—the temptation held out for those merchants and business men to club together and say to the postmaster that if he will locate his office in a particular part of the city which will suit them they will give him the use of a building for the purpose at a nominal rental—is not necessarily a consideration sufficient to justify the Department in locating a post-office, nor should it prejudice the rights of any community to have a public building eligibly located in the interest of all the people.

Mr. CANNON. A question right there.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] if he does not know that it is a part of the policy of the Post-Office Department to get up this competition throughout the length and breadth of the country in different towns for the location of the post-offices in those towns, so as to get rooms for the use of those offices at a nominal rent? And if we cease to follow that policy the rent of buildings for the use of post-offices that now cost, comparatively speaking, a very small sum will amount to multiplied millions of dollars. Now, I wish to ask the gentleman if he is ready to advise the abandoning of the present policy on the part of the Post-Office Department?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. In answer to that I will say, first, that I do not admit the premise that it will cost the Government untold millions of dollars. I say, further, that if the Post-Office Department undertake to stimulate in this country that kind of competition, it is acting outside of the law and outside of justice and of decency.

I say the same principle would lead the Department to tempt bidders from the State of Maine, for instance, to try and obtain little local post-routes in my county as against persons living in the county, men of honor and of honesty, who will promptly and faithfully perform the duty.

Mr. HORR. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Not at present, until I have finished a sentence or two. It is a policy which tempts men to come in and compete for the location of our public business where perhaps it should not be. This great Government is abundantly able, as is any business man, to locate its offices where it most needs them and to pay a proper price for them. I say that a government like ours ought to locate its court-houses and its post-offices where they will be most convenient to the public at large, and should not be swerved from that purpose by competitive bidding of localities.

Does the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] or the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] say that if a banker or a merchant were to go into the city of Hannibal he would be tempted by a combination of citizens owning real estate to locate his business house on the outskirts of that town, because he could thereby save a hundred dollars in rent? No, sir. What we want as a government is to go into a rising city like Hannibal, if you please, where the ground increases in value double in every ten years, and purchase the most eligible square or corner lot in that city, and there build a structure for the use of the Government, not ornate in architecture, but sufficiently large to accommodate all the Government business, and then let the Government property appreciate in value with the other property in the city. Let the Government plant its flag there, if you please; teach all sections to appreciate the dignity of the General Government, and uphold and sustain it as it ought to be sustained.

Will the gentleman tell me that the Government should go "jayhawking" all over a city every two or three years merely to save $100 in the rent of a post-office?

Mr. HORR. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. I have been following pretty implicitly the reports of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; and I want to know whether that committee adopts the rule of recommending the erection of a public building simply for a post-office where there are no courts or anything of that kind, and merely taking into account the size of the town. For instance, yesterday I should have voted against the bill for a public building at Jackson, Tennessee, had there not been a United States court at that place. Now, has the gentleman any idea how many cities there are in the United States that pay more postal revenue and have a larger population than the city of Hannibal, and that can present in favor of the erection of a post-office building every possible reason that can be urged in the case of Hannibal? I wish to know whether the committee adopts the policy of recommending a post-office building in every such city as that?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. In answer to the gentleman I will say that our committee does not adopt the policy of recommending the construction of a public building at every city where there is simply a post-office.

Mr. HORR. I said every city as large as Hannibal.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Every city as large as Hannibal. Nor does the Committee on Invalid Pensions undertake to pension every deserving soldier in the country, simply because we have a few pension bills on our Calendar. We cannot consider at once the claims of all who are deserving of pensions. So I do not undertake to say that there are not in the district of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HORR,] or the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] cities as much entitled to a public building as the city of Hannibal. But I say that they have not presented their claims to our committee. Nor do I say that this city is more deserving than other cities whose claims are now before our committee. I do not say that I heartily agree to the report that has been made in this case; I always reserve the right to dissent from any report. But my committee instructed one of its members to report this bill favorably; and I am only defending the general principle which I assert, that whenever the Government finds itself needing accommodations which will cost $2,500 or $3,000 a year in the way of rent; when it has revenue offices and other offices which must be accommodated permanently and should be in fire-proof rooms; when this is the case in a growing city where rents are increasing materially every year, I say that then there ought to be, in my judgment, a public building sufficiently large to accommodate these public offices.

The bill passed yesterday for a court-house at Jackson, Tennessee, was certainly deserving of consideration. Some complaint was made yesterday about a bill which passed the House in which the term "court-house" was used when in fact no court is held in that city at present. I did not then get the opportunity to say what I say now, that the bill was not reported from our committee, but was a Senate bill passed under a suspension of rules. We as a committee are not responsible for the phraseology of that bill. We eliminate the word court-house when a bill comes before our committee unless courts are understood to be authorized and need accommodations. I would be glad if we had an hour or two hours for the discussion of every bill like this. I want to see a bill that cannot stand on its merits voted down after discussion, and a bill that can stand on its merits go through. I wish to see every unworthy bill, if there be such bills carelessly agreed to in committee, eliminated from our Calendar, and every worthy bill passed.

We have presented to-day in the city of New York an illustration which justifies the Government in owning property in growing cities. In 1860 the United States Government purchased in that city a building for its post-office. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars was paid, of which the citizens contributed fifty thousand. The Government has owned that property from that date to this, escaping meanwhile the payment of large rentals which would otherwise have been necessitated. To-day we have on our Calendar a bill proposing to sell that property and turn the proceeds into the United States Treasury; and from that little lot which cost the Government $200,000, we expect to realize possibly $800,000 or more, leaving a surplus of $600,000 or more to go into the Treasury. This, I think, is a sufficient vindication of the principle which we now seek to inaugurate in reference to growing cities like Detroit, Minneapolis, Denver, and all other cities where property, especially eligible lots, which the Government may now purchase, will in a generation double or treble in value. But, which is more important, there the national Government may transact its legitimate business without being at the mercy of State authorities or subjected to the extortionate demands of private citizens, who compel the Government to pay, in the shape of rentals, local taxes, insurance, and a high interest besides, as in this city.

Mr. HATCH resumed the floor.

Mr. WILLITS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] a question.

Mr. HATCH. Certainly.

Mr. WILLITS. The gentleman has referred to the fact that in two Congresses a report from the Judiciary Committee has been made in favor of a United States court at Hannibal——

Mr. HATCH. The gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. WILLITS. I wish to know whether one of the inducements offered to the committee in both instances was not that the citizens of Hannibal should pay the expense of the court-room?

Mr. HATCH. A provision of that kind has been in every court bill reported by the Judiciary Committee—to operate, of course, until the Government has a building of its own.

Mr. WILLITS. I wish to protest here to-day against the proposition made by some gentlemen here that because a court is held in a place, therefore the Government ought to have a public building there. I admit the general doctrine that the Government ought to have a court-room at every place where it holds court. I say for one, if we enter upon that policy I shall in the future scrutinize every claim for an extra court in the United States. I am willing to bring these courts as near home to the people as we can, but we know that as soon as such a bill passes then comes in another for a public building. It was so in the last Congress, and the one before that as well as in this. The prime move is to get a court and the next to get a building to put it in.

Mr. HATCH. The gentleman from Michigan asked me to yield to him, and I will do so for a question.

Mr. HORR. I wished to make a few desultory remarks.

Mr. HATCH. I hope the gentleman will not press his demand at this time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 93, noes 37.

Mr. CANNON. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 126, nays 52, not voting 113; as follows:

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. HATCH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TARIFF COMMISSION.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I now renew the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to proceed with the consideration of the tariff-commission bill; and, pending that motion, I move that all debate be closed on Thursday next.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand that as serving notice on the House, I do not think myself it is possible to get through with the debate in that time, certainly not before Saturday. As a mere notice I hope it may produce what the gentleman desires.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman from Iowa will move a definite time, I think perhaps the House would support him.

Mr. KASSON. I think, in accordance with the understanding that was made when this question was first brought to the attention of the House, that the manner in which I have indicated to close the debate would perhaps be more satisfactory to both sides of the House. At that time the sense of the House can have been fully tested as to whether it desires to prolong the debate.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If this requires unanimous consent, I object.

Mr. KENNA. Will the gentleman from Iowa permit me to make an inquiry with reference to the disposition of the time remaining? Some gentlemen on this side of the House who favor the bill desire to be heard upon it. I myself would like to be heard for a few minutes.

Mr. KASSON. I can safely say to the gentleman from West Virginia that at least half the time, and possibly more, will go to that side of the House.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Iowa is, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union——

Mr. RANDALL. It is understood that there is no committal about Thursday.

The SPEAKER. And pending that, the gentleman from Iowa moves that all general debate upon the bill be closed in Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman from Iowa fix an hour?

Mr. KASSON. I think it would be preferable not to specify an hour.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I have already objected to this arrangement if unanimous consent is required.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that unanimous consent is required to determine the time for closing the debate upon this question.

Mr. REED. Then I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Iowa by inserting three or four o'clock, I am indifferent which; but let us fix some hour when this debate will close.

Mr. RANDALL. I move a further amendment by fixing Saturday as the date when the debate shall be closed.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentleman from Maine will not insist upon fixing an hour upon Thursday to close the debate.

Mr. KELLEY. I think it would be in violation of the repeated understanding upon the floor of this House.

Mr. REED. I never entered into any understanding of that kind.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to be heard on this point——

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa if it was not understood that the debate was to be unrestricted.

Mr. KELLEY. That is my recollection of the arrangement which twice received the decided sanction of the House. I believe that by Thursday, if the agreement to devote the time exclusively to this subject shall have been lived up to, the debate may close at least by Thursday afternoon.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Then I will suggest to fix no specific hour, but to let the debate continue until Thursday, and then the House will have it in its power to determine whether it is ready to close the debate or not.

Mr. KELLEY. And especially do I object to fixing an hour on Thursday. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means is expected to sum up the general debate, and it is within my personal knowledge that many gentlemen have alluded to particular points on which they desire to hear an explanation, and about which there will necessarily be some discussion. And taking the example of this House to-day, Mr. Speaker, here is more than an hour and a half of our time already exhausted, and little business has been transacted. Now, you fix the hour of three o'clock on Thursday to close this debate. Other business will necessarily intervene, and the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means may be given the summing up at that debate at the end of the day's session within twenty or thirty minutes of the time fixed for closing the debate. And for what? Why, that the hour named by the gentleman when this business is to be ended shall have arrived to enable the House probably to adjourn. You can as well give to the subject the balance of the day as to attempt to close it within a limited number of hours, and fix a specific time when it must be closed. I hope the effort will not be made, and that if the House shall determine to close the debate on Thursday no time will be fixed for it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the question is not debatable.

Mr. REED. I think it very proper that I should be allowed to say a word in response to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. My object in proposing three or four o'clock was for the reason that I am satisfied it would meet the approval of the House to come to a vote at a specified time upon this question. I sincerely believe that the House wants to debate further, while many members are ready to vote upon the question, but at the same time it will welcome a reasonable deliverance; and if that cannot be secured by naming a time, and it seems to be the impression of those gentlemen around me that it cannot, then I will withdraw the motion to fix an hour and take a vote upon the proposition to close the debate on Thursday without reference to the hour.

Mr. KASSON. I will add, if it is very desirable in order to accommodate other gentlemen who desire to speak, that I shall ask the House to fix one or two evening sessions, as the case may be. But I am satisfied from what I know that gentlemen are generally ready to dispose of the question now, and that if the time fixed is devoted to debate the House can be content and will be content to close the discussion on Thursday. I ask that order be made.

Mr. KENNA. I hope the gentleman from Iowa does not understand me as desiring to prolong the debate. I shall only want a few minutes myself.

Mr. KASSON. I have no doubt the gentleman will have all the time he desires.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question to the House. The gentleman from Iowa moves that all general debate be closed in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on Thursday next. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to amend by making it Saturday next.

Mr. KASSON. Oh, no; that is not part of the understanding.

Mr. CARLISLE. I desire to make a single statement. When there was an understanding arrived at in the Committee on Ways and Means that the general debate on this bill should be closed on last Thursday, it was also understood, as has been frequently stated on the floor of the House, that we should procure all the time possible for debate during the week preceding this. As a matter of fact, by reason of the intervention of the Committee on Elections, we secured only a part of one day during that week for the discussion of this measure.

Now it is proposed to close this debate on Thursday; that is, at the same time during this week that it would have been closed last week had we procured the time we expected to procure during the week preceding.

I think the gentleman from Iowa ought to let the debate go on for two or three days at least, that we may see whether gentlemen on the floor who desire to speak have had an apportunity to do so. I do not think there is the slightest desire, so far as I know, to prevent the close of the general debate at the earliest possible moment after gentlemen on both sides have been heard. But to fix a day now on which the debate shall certainly close would almost inevitably have the effect of preventing some gentlemen on one side or the other, and possibly on both sides, from being heard; which of course will cause dissatisfaction.

Mr. REED. I think the amount of suffering which will be caused by some gentlemen not being heard is a serious matter for the consideration of this House.

Mr. CARLISLE. This is a great public question. It is of as much importance as any other question pending before this Congress, in my opinion.

Mr. HUMPHREY. And it has consumed more time than any other three questions together have done.

Mr. RANDALL. So it should.

Mr. KELLEY. So it did in the last Presidential campaign, and so it will in the next.

Mr. HUMPHREY. There was not a tariff commission before the people during the Presidential campaign; but the tariff question was before them.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to apprise the House what the effect will be of adopting Thursday as the day to conclude general debate on this bill. It is well known that the committee members who have not yet spoken must have, or will desire at least, two days; and the effect of fixing Thursday at this time will be to exclude every member here, except members of the committee, after to-day.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to be allowed a single word in reply to the suggestions of my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE.] My recollection, to which my memorandum corresponds, is that no part of the week which we lost was designated as actually coming to us. We were to get what was convenient under the notice that we must give way to general business if we did not come to a vote that week. We did have one entire day. I offered two or three evenings, which the other side did not desire to take. That part of the agreement was carried out entirely according to my understanding of it. And this week is to be substituted for that week in order to carry out that understanding in good faith.

Since that agreement was made the House will remember we commenced our sessions an hour earlier each day. Consequently we are getting an hour more on each of the three days this week.

I believe my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is in error in saying the gentlemen who specially desire to be heard will not be heard under the arrangement now proposed. For I have noticed and noted on my list those who have expressed that special desire, and there is ample room for that; I find room for more, indeed, according to my estimate of the time.

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire to say one word.

Mr. TAYLOR. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This question is not debatable except by unanimous consent.

Mr. COX, of New York. The Chair has allowed other gentlemen to debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has done so because the regular order was not called.

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire to say only one word. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] knows I want to speak and have intended to speak on this question. The House, however, broke the continuity of the debate by the contested-election cases, appropriation bills, &c. We are now almost in the middle of this week, and there will be no full opportunity for debate if it is closed on Thursday. I ask my friend from Iowa not to press his motion now. There is no disposition on this side of the House to prevent a vote being taken if we are treated as we ought to be treated. The gentleman from Maine makes a reflection on this side——

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him? I have no reflection to make on one side or the other. My remarks were not political. They had reference simply to the transaction of the business of the House and the saving of time of members. Every one possessing the experience of the gentleman from New York knows we can bring this thing to an end consistent with the rights of all the members if we give notice three days beforehand that we will close the debate on a particular day. By doing so we will save ourselves the discomfort of sitting here in the hot summer months.

Mr. COX, of New York. But you do not give three days' notice. You propose to close this debate really on one day's notice.

Mr. REED. We have to-day, to-morrow, and Thursday.

Mr. COX, of New York. A large portion of to-day is gone, and the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means will take up Thursday. Let me say, however, that I would be content to vote for having the debate closed on Saturday.

Mr. KASSON. Saturday is an inconvenient day for many reasons. I desire to take the sense of the House on the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move to amend the amendment so as to fix Tuesday next for the close of the debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] moves that the general debate on the tariff-commission bill shall be closed in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on Thursday next. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] moves to amend that motion by fixing Saturday instead of Thursday. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] moves to amend the amendment by fixing Tuesday next. The question is first on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and there were upon a division—ayes 34, noes 74.

So (no further count being called for) the amendment of Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] that general debate be closed on Saturday next.

Mr. RANDALL. I think that will be agreeable to both sides.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 73, noes 86.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for tellers.

The SPEAKER. A quorum has voted, and the gentleman calls for tellers.

Mr. RANDALL. I will call for the yeas and nays at once.

Mr. KASSON. It is suggested that as an adjustment of this difficulty I agree to Friday next; and to settle that question now I am willing to say Friday.

Mr. ANDERSON. I would like to inquire whether the gentleman means simply to close the general debate on Friday or to take a vote at that time?

The SPEAKER. The question is upon closing general debate.

Mr. ANDERSON. And does the gentleman mean to take a vote at that time?

Mr. KASSON. I mean all that can be implied in the order.

Mr. REED. I suggest that the order be to close general debate at 4 o'clock on Friday next, so that we can have a vote on this subject on Friday.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is fair.

Mr. RANDALL. The easiest way is the best. Let us do this in harmony. Saturday will be satisfactory.

Mr. REED. I submit that there should be some harmony toward this side; not all toward the other side.

Mr. KASSON. I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that Friday was accepted by several gentlemen on that side before I made the offer. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon Saturday.

Mr. RANDALL. Those gentlemen may have communicated with the gentleman from Iowa; they have not with me. So far as I can hear from the majority on this side, we desire to have Saturday.

Mr. KENNA. I hope this side of the House will insist upon Saturday.

Mr. KASSON. That is more than the agreement, and in that case I must insist upon a vote being taken upon my proposition to close general debate on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] calls for the yeas and nays on his motion to substitute Saturday for Thursday as the time for closing general debate.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were 41 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 89, nays 94, not voting 108; as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that general debate in Committee of the Whole on the tariff-commission bill terminate on Thursday next.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 64, noes 2.

Mr. RANDALL. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. KASSON and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, no 1.

Mr. RANDALL. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will resume their places.

Mr. KASSON. I am bound to recognize the fact that though there is a quorum in the House gentlemen desire to make an issue by not acceding to the wishes of the majority in fixing a day.

Mr. RANDALL. There was a bare majority against fixing Saturday. We consider that to allow the debate to run until that time is only reasonable, and that if agreed to it will result in no further delay.

Mr. KASSON. I must say that in view of the repeated statements made in public as signifying the understanding at which we arrived, that there should be only three more days for general debate, I do not see the propriety of this demand. But in order to allow opportunity for reaching, if possible, a satisfactory arrangement, I withdraw, with the permission of the House, my motion to fix a day for terminating debate; and in order to save time I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the tariff-commission bill.

The motion was agreed to.

TARIFF COMMISSION.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2315) to provide for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff and internal-revenue laws.

Mr. CHACE addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee rose informally, and Mr. HASKELL took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Two messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House, by Mr. PRUDEN, his Secretary, who also announced to the House that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 721) to authorize the appointment of an ordnance store-keeper in the Army;

An act (H. R. No. 813) to amend section 5254, title 63, Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the use of piers and cribs in the Mississippi River;

An act (H. R. No. 3869) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 161) making an appropriation to enable the Light-House Board to meet the extraordinary expenses consequent upon the flood in the Mississippi River; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 185) granting the use of tents at the soldiers' reunion to be held at Belle Plaine in the month of September or October, 1882.

TARIFF-COMMISSION

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, in this age the claims of science are everywhere recognized. Not a ship is sailed, not a bridge is constructed, not a shaft is sunk without consulting its lessons. And I believe that when this Congress undertakes to pass a tariff law, or to amend our tariff laws which reach down to the homes of all the people of this country and affect every man, it ought to recognize the claims of science, if there be any science bearing on the subject.

I have been taught to believe, and I do believe, that political economy is such a science. Now, I am well aware that the practical statesman will not construct laws solely according to theory. It is our duty when we come to legislate to consider the situation of the country, the circumstances which surround us, the condition of all our industries. And yet it is equally important that the theory upon which we proceed shall be correct.

I received the other day, as other members of this House did, a pamphlet which advises us in reforming or attempting to reform or change our tariff laws to disregard the lessons of science, of political economy, as taught in books and in the schools. I have thought that I might give a new turn to this debate by attempting to answer this pamphlet.

I hold it in my hand. It is entitled "Tariff Tract No. 4, 1882." It is published by the American Iron and Steel Association, at No. 261 South Fourth street, Philadelphia, "where copies of this tract may be had for distribution. Address James M. Swank, secretary."

Now, we are not advised that the colporteur will carry this tract around for the enlightenment of the heathen. But it is intimated that all who wish to put it in the hands of the unconverted have only to apply to Mr. James M. Swank, where copies of it can be had freely and without price.

From the fact that this pamphlet is so circulated by this association, and from the fact that it is by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] the ablest, the oldest, the most distinguished advocate of protection on this floor, I take it that it says about all that can be said in the brief space of a magazine article in favor of that theory and against the theory of free trade. The author of that pamphlet has been kept in this House by his constituents for more than twenty years to defend their peculiar interests. He is able and faithful. He has devoted laborious days and nights to the study of the question he takes up in this article.

The article is a carefully-prepared, well-considered paper; and if anything can convince us that political economy is not a science, but a fraud, and that the "Cobden Club" and the devil are one and the same thing, we certainly shall find it in this pamphlet. It has the taking title, "A science based on assumptions;" and it is a grave attack on political economy as taught in all the schools almost without exception since the day when Adam Smith wrote his "Wealth of Nations," now more than a hundred years ago. The gentleman, as the basis of his attack, as the text of his article, attributes this expression to John Stuart Mill. He says:

> John Stuart Mill declared political economy to be a science based on assumption.

The argument then proceeds on the assumption that this extract fairly expresses the idea of the great author. No reference is given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to show from what part of the writings of Mr. Mill this sentence is extracted, but I take it that the gentleman means to quote from a book which I hold in my hand, published in 1844, and from a chapter devoted to "the definitions and methods of political economy." Nowhere in the writings of Mill do I find any expression which would justify this text, unless it be that which is found at page 144 of that book. The text as I find it there reads:

> It [political economy] reasons, and as we contend must necessarily reason, from assumptions, not from facts. It is built upon hypotheses strictly analogous to those which, under the name of definitions, are the foundation of other abstract sciences.

Now, mark you, Mr. Chairman, the author does not give this as definition, he does not say, as Judge KELLEY says, that political economy is a science founded on assumptions; but he says it reasons from assumptions, and he goes on to explain what he means by this expression.

"Geometry," says Mill, "presupposes an arbitrary definition of a line, 'that which has length but not breadth.' Just in the same manner does political economy suppose an arbitrary definition of a man," &c.

Again: "No mathematician ever thought that his definition of a line corresponded to an actual line. As little did any political economist ever imagine that real men had no object of desire but wealth," &c. In the same article Mill says, page 133: "Political economy, therefore, presupposes all the physical sciences; it takes for granted all such of the truths of those sciences as are concerned in the production of the object demanded by the wants of mankind," &c. In other words, the author means that political economy assumes the facts of physics and the well-known laws of human nature and reasons from these.

Now, I challenge the gentleman from Pennsylvania to prove that any one of the assumptions of the political economists is as unfair as his assumption that the quotation with which he heads his article gives a fair idea of the position of John Stuart Mill. If the gentleman wishes to destroy the science, let him assail some one of the assumptions, the postulates, the premises on which it is founded.

If he does this successfully, then he may succeed. He cannot do so by the ad captandum use of a single phrase wrenched from its place in a chapter of forty-four pages devoted to the definition and method of political economy, and even then not quoted literally. But Judge KELLEY says the reasoning of the political economists is entirely a priori as contradistinguished from the inductive method pursued by Bacon, Newton, and others.

On page 149 of this same chapter Mill says:

> The desires of man and the nature of the conduct to which they prompt him are within the reach of our observation. We can also observe what are the objects of those desires. * * * Knowing, therefore, accurately the properties of the substances, we may reason with as much certainty as in the most demonstrative parts of physics from any assumed set of circumstances.

In other words, Mill says political economists arrive at the laws, the premises, the assumptions from which they reason by observation. This is precisely the mode adopted in all science. It was thus Newton discovered the law of gravitation. He saw an apple fall. He reflected that other heavy objects everywhere fell in the same direction—toward the center of the earth. He therefore assumed the law of gravitation, and subsequent observation everywhere has confirmed the assumption. Now, the philosopher takes this assumption of Newton as a postulate; takes it to be a law and reasons from it by the a priori method to practical results. So all the laws of astronomy were first discovered by observation or assumptions from circumstances. When these assumptions are verified they are accepted as laws. Reasoning from these laws downward by the a priori method, man is enabled to predict the comets as they come, and to weigh the planets as they roll through the universe. So the political economists have their laws, their assumptions, to reason from. These laws or assumptions no man can successfully deny. They may, like the physical laws of nature, be subject to disturbing influences. The apple will not always drop straight toward the center of the earth. In a wind-storm it may be blown to the east or the west.

So one of the assumptions of the political economists is that man in his business affairs will do that which he thinks it his interest to do. He may be influenced now and then by natural affection, by friendship, by patriotism; but in the absence of such disturbing causes the general law of self-interest will operate. Reasoning from this general law, the political economist would say that iron companies and steel companies formed themselves into the Iron and Steel Association of America to promote their business interests. Will the gentleman say this assumption is untrue? He would also say that this iron and steel association paid its money to print and circulate Judge KELLEY'S article, because it was believed that with all its assumptions the paper was among the best that could be written in defense of protection. Will the gentleman deny this?

Mr. Chairman, all the assumptions, the postulates upon which political economists are agreed, are just like and just as unanswerable as this.

The gentleman states the position of the two conflicting theories thus:

> The professed aim of political economy is cosmopolitanism, while protectionists labor to secure to each nation industrial and commercial independence and the enjoyment of its resources and autonomy.

That free trade, like liberty, is cosmopolitan, is true. The scientists who advocate it would have all men help all other men—each nation contribute whatever it could to every other nation—all climes, all seasons, all soils helpful to all men who would help themselves. And protection, when logically carried out, seeks to make each nation shut itself up within its own borders, so that each may become industrially independent and commercially independent of every other nation.

I lived a portion of my life, Mr. Chairman, in a country that was commercially independent. We had no commerce with foreign nations. We were industrially independent. Our labor could not come in conflict with the so-called "pauper labor of Europe." Whatever we ate, whatever we drank, whatever we wore, whatever we enjoyed, we produced at home. We were completely protected; protected at sea by ships of war closing up every port, on land by walls of bayonets all around us. The late confederacy was a practical illustration of the beauties of protection. We emphatically lived at home. We had no coffee, but we made it of corn and of rye and of potatoes. I remember to have tried coffee made of acorns. Nevertheless, though it was a home product, I did not admire acorn coffee. I was proud of our native oaks that struck their roots so deep into the soil and lifted their branches so grandly in the air, yet I craved coffee from South America.

Salt with us was sometimes so scarce that a sack which across the line was worth $1 was equal in value to a bale of cotton which across the line was worth $200. We had cotton in abundance; it was rotting often for want of shelter; but we had a system of protection that would not permit us to sell or exchange. That system of protection—and protection means prohibition—gradually starved the confederacy to death. All that time the North was fighting for free trade; it wanted to sell us its wares and its notions, and get our cotton in exchange. The West was fighting for free trade; it wanted the Mississippi free to the sea; it wanted to sell us its corn, its flour, and its bacon. Will any gentleman tell me why, if it is desirable that the farmers of the West should have a market for their produce in the South, it is not also desirable, when they have stocked that market, they should have a market in Europe? Will any gentleman tell me why, if these same farmers should desire to bring back in exchange for their products cotton, tobacco, and oranges from the South without toll and without duty, it is not also desirable for them to bring back from Europe blankets and clothing free of toll and free of duty?

Why do we rejoice at the completion of every railroad that connects the North and the South, or the East and the West? Simply, sir, because it gives us freer trade, more commerce with each other, more liberty of exchange. Why is there a sentiment abroad among the people that compels us to vote millions to our rivers and harbors? Simply and solely that we may have more transportation and that we may free our commerce from the restrictions, the tolls, the tariffs placed on it by railroad monopolies. But, sir, of what avail is it that we should dredge out our rivers that run down to the sea if at the ocean's mouth we are to put a custom-house officer to forbid foreign articles from coming up those rivers to supply the wants of our people? Will gentlemen say that we are to have cheap transportation for our products down to the sea that we may export and sell but no liberty to buy and import? Remember, sir, we are now discussing the theories of free trade and protection. Which theory is right?

Judge KELLEY says that while free trade is cosmopolitan protection seeks to secure to each nation commercial and industrial independence. He is seeking to show that under wise statesmanship every nation would secure for itself this inestimable boon. Under this system, if adopted by all nations, England would cease to depend upon America for cotton. She would shut her ports to our great Southern staple and rely upon India. Every nation in Europe would shut out the corn and the wheat and the beef and pork and cheese and butter, and all the products of our Western farms. The land-owners in England and France and Germany would exclude all the natural products of our soil under the cry of protection against the cheap lands in America. The people of different nations can only cease to depend on each other when they cease to rely on each other for anything. Under Judge KELLEY's system, that each nation should be commercially independent and industrially independent of every other nation, not a ship would cross the ocean. The commerce of the world would be dead, for all peoples would be living at home, buying and selling only within their own borders.

It is no wonder that every scientific student who sits in his closet and speculates for the good of his fellow-man, who is perfectly unbiased and has no favored class behind him, no associated capital whose interest he is bound as a representative man to represent, is opposed to a theory that would strike such a blow at the progress of civilization.

The gentleman, who I am sorry to see has left his seat, will say that I am reasoning on assumptions. I am; on the assumption simply that all nations should carry out the policy recommended by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. But I admit, sir, that the assumption is absurd, simply because the theory on which it is founded, as tested by the wants, as tested by the necessities, as tested by the experience of mankind is itself absurd, as applicable to nations at peace with each other. When we leave out of consideration the dangers of war between nations and the question of revenues for the support of Government, the theory of protection—which means interference with the liberty of the citizen, a denial to him of the natural and God-given right to sell where he can sell highest and buy where he can buy cheapest—is, from a purely scientific stand-point, the baldest fallacy, the grossest violation of natural right ever yet attempted by associated capital to be propagated in a free country.

Mr. Chairman, I know that the practical statesman cannot disregard the lessons of experience; but neither can he disregard the teachings of science. On this point I quote again from the same author and the same essay quoted as authority by Judge KELLEY. Mill says:

> No one who attempts to lay down propositions for the guidance of mankind, however perfect his scientific acquirements, can dispense with a practical knowledge of the actual modes in which the affairs of the world are carried on, and an extensive personal experience of the actual ideas, feelings, and intellectual and moral tendencies of his own country and of his own age. The true practical statesman is he who combines this experience with a profound knowledge of abstract political philosophy. Either acquirement without the other leaves him lame and impotent if he is sensible of the deficiency; renders him obstinate and presumptuous if, as is more probable, he is entirely unconscious of it.

I do not, sir, disregard or forget the lessons of experience. I know very well if the confederacy had been filled with machine-shops, with wagon factories, with factories of all kinds, it would have been able to make a better fight for independence than it did. But we are in a different situation now. This nation numbers fifty million people, brave and warlike, with every cause of domestic dissension removed, with a Union absolutely indissoluble, with our industries in an advanced state, and reserving the condition of industries for consideration when we come to adjusting duties, the simple question in this discussion of the theory is how far and to what extent does the danger or possibility of a war in the future with some foreign nation justify us in departing from the principle of free trade or of a tariff for revenue?

I think all men will admit that we could, (perhaps I should not say all men will admit it,) but I believe it to be demonstrably true that with less than the cost of a high protective tariff we could build up a navy that would ride the seas against all the powers of the world, and we could support an army of one hundred thousand men. But all men will agree that we do not need any such navy or any such army, and it seems to me that there is an end of the argument for a high protective tariff as a war measure. But I will pass on to this pamphlet. I am now merely discussing and endeavoring to answer the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who seeks to prove that the teachings of political economy are of the class of airy nothings bodied forth by the poets.

Beyond his contention that political economy is a science based on assumptions, how does he seek to prove this assertion?

He makes an attack on England and English policy. Suppose he proves, as he attempts to do, and as we must admit the fact to be, that England has been and is selfish and grasping; that she has not always practiced free trade; that since she has professed it, now not more than forty years, she has not always allowed other nations or peoples to reap its benefits, does that prove that Judge KELLEY's assumption is true that the "beautiful and seductive theories" of our Sumners and Perrys "must be classed with the airy nothings bodied forth by the poets?" Why, sir, we may admit all the crimes he charges on England to be proven, and this does not touch the question. Suppose we admit that prior to the establishment of our independence England, by unfair legislation and hostile edicts, prevented the establishment of manufactures in these colonies; suppose we admit that even since England has adopted free trade as her own policy she has denied it to her colonies, does that prove that free trade would not have benefited those colonies? Why, sir, the gentleman himself disproves his own theory and absolutely demonstrates the theory he is opposing by what he says about India.

I send to the Clerk's desk and ask him to read the passage marked on pages 14 and 15.

The Clerk read as follows:

> So late as August, 1875, when trade in Manchester was peculiarly depressed, the British Viceroy, in the face of a vote of his council against the destructive measure, abolished the slight duty remaining on cotton goods, and by the same edict imposed an import duty of 5 per cent. on long-staple cotton (a vital element of their manufactures) imported into India. The Calcutta Englishman of August 5, of that year, said:
> "The new tariff bill is about as infamous a measure as ever a subservient legislature sought to impose upon a voiceless people. An import duty on raw material is, under any circumstances, one of the worst modes of raising revenue that can be devised; but the duty which the Government is about to impose on a particular quality of her cotton imported into this country is nicely calculated to produce the greatest amount of injury that could possibly be inflicted by such an impost.

None but an alien government, or a despotic and ignorant government, bent on filling its coffers for the nonce at any cost, would have adopted such a course as this. No free people would have thus drawn the knife across their own throats."
> The Bombay Gazette of the 10th of the same month denounced the measure with equal severity. The Indian chambers of commerce appealed to the Viceroy, but appealed in vain. The modern cotton mills of India were doomed. I challenge history and literature for a parallel to the grim irony involved in professions of devotion to the freedom of trade by the English Government and people, who are responsible for the condition of India and Ireland.

Mr. FISHER. Will the gentleman from Alabama allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HERBERT. Yes, sir.

Mr. FISHER. If I understand the line of the gentleman's argument, he admits that the southern confederacy could have made a better defense if she had been better supplied with founderies and factories and had protected her salt interests, &c., and the gentleman contends that now, inasmuch as we have increased within the last twenty years till we have become a people of over fifty millions and have developed our manufacturing interests to a greater extent, it would be the true policy of this country, after developing under the protective system, to cast it aside and become a free-trade nation. Is that the line of the gentleman's argument?

Mr. HERBERT. Is the gentleman through with his question?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HERBERT. I started out in my argument with saying I was discussing the theory of free trade as contradistinguished from the theory of protection; that I believed it was the duty of this Congress, when undertaking to legislate, to take into consideration the situation of the country, the circumstances by which it was surrounded, the condition of its industries also, and that, having these all in view, then it was important to start out upon a correct theory. We cannot have free trade, because we must have an immense revenue. This revenue I favor collecting by a tariff. That tariff, properly adjusted, will afford protection. I am not in favor of violent measures that would bring distress in any quarter of our common country. I am combating what I consider an incorrect and fallacious theory advocated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] I think that is the answer to the gentleman.

But I do not want to be diverted from my argument. I sent that extract up to the Clerk to read to show how the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania destroys his own theory. He attributes the ruin of the cotton manufactures of India to the fact that a 5 per cent. tax was put upon long-staple cotton, which was simply one of the ingredients necessary to the manufacture of cotton goods in India. He showed that the burden on that one single article of 5 per cent., in other words the negation to India of the right of free trade in cotton simply by putting on long-staple cotton a 5 per cent. tax ruined the cotton interests of India. And then he challenges history for a parallel to the conduct of England toward India. I can give the gentleman a parallel which extends its lines beyond the crime he denounces.

Iron ship-building has revolutionized the carrying trade of the world. Before the late war, in the days of wooden vessels, we built more ships than any other nation. But since the advent of iron vessels our carrying trade, which is a measure of our ship-building, because we cannot carry in foreign-built vessels, has been steadily passing into other hands. From 1865 down to the present, the percentage of American commerce carried in American bottoms has been going down year by year. Why is this? We have taxed everything going into an iron vessel—the iron, the steel, the ropes, the copper, and all on an average of more than 40 per cent. If a tax of 5 per cent. on one of the products entering into the manufacture of cotton ruined India, how much more certain is it that a tax of more than 40 per cent. on everything going into the make-up of a ship has ruined ship-building in America? I take the following from our Consular Reports, published for February, 1882:

The American Flag on the Mediterranean.—Consul Rice, of Leghorn, in his report for the quarter ending September 30, 1881, writes concerning the absence of the American flag from that port:

"It is with deep regret I am forced to inform you of the fact that another quarter has expired without my being able to note the arrival or departure of a merchant vessel bearing the American flag, thus making three consecutive quarters during which our flag has not been seen flying in the port of Leghorn, except on board of our men-of-war during their occasional visits to protect a commerce which does not exist, and I predict that within the space of two years, unless Congress comes to the relief of American ship-builders and ship-owners, our Navy will comprise the only ships which help read our renown to the outside world.

"I read with much pleasure the able and masterly report of my colleague, Hon. William L. Scruggs, consul at Canton, published in the Consular Reports, under date of April 2, 1881, referring to the present state of our merchant marine; and what he states of Chinese waters is equally true with regard to those of the Mediterranean, and the universal cry is, cannot something be done to restore our carrying trade?"

If England played the stepmother to India by imposing a tax of 5 per cent., what shall we say of the conduct of the protectionists toward the ship-building interests of America? And the gentleman talks about our high tariff securing our independence. Independence! Why, we are the most dependent nation in the world, simply because we have no shipping of our own in which to do our own carrying. Our commerce depends not only on keeping the peace ourselves but on peace or war between other nations. Our commerce would be ruined by a war between England and any of the other great maritime powers of the world.

Again, the gentleman attributes the condition of Ireland to free trade. To prove this he cites an extract from a speech of Thomas Francis Meagher, in which he arraigns England, among other things, for destroying Irish manufactures. I have before me the speech of Mr. Meagher. Nowhere in it does he say all these evils came from free trade. He is arguing for the right of Ireland to govern herself.

Elsewhere he puts the wrongs of Ireland in a comprehensive manner. In a speech delivered in Conciliation Hall on the 6th of April, 1846, he says:

"The archbishop of Dublin is an Englishman," writes the Evening Mail, "the chief administrator of the Irish poor law is an Englishman, the paymaster of the Irish civil services is a Scotchman, the chief commissioner of the Irish public works is an Englishman, the teller of the exchequer is an Englishman, the chief officer of the Irish post-office is an Englishman, the collector of excise is a Scotchman, the head of the revenue police is an Englishman, the second in command is a Scotchman, the persons employed in the collection of customs, &c., are English or Scotch in the proportion of thirty-five to one." Thus, you see, that while the Irish belong to Ireland, Ireland does not belong to the Irish.

This was first-class carpet-baggery. "When the stranger rules, the people mourn."

I read from another Irishman, discussing the causes of the Irish famine. Henry Giles, one of the most eloquent of the sons of that unhappy isle, says, in 1848:

The landlords are the owners of the soil, who expend no capital and who take even more than the profit. The land cannot support these two classes as at present related. The landlord must have state and luxury, not expending time or labor or money, though the tenant, spending time and labor and money, has not subsistence. The best of the produce, animal and vegetable, is exported—

Exported, mark you, because the landlord is an absentee—to meet the landlord's demands; the worst is retained to supply the cultivator's wants. The cultivator must pay or quit. He sells his wheat, his oats, his stock to pay. He reserves the potato on which to exist. The potato fails; the cultivator becomes a pauper or a corpse.

Judge KELLEY says, on page 12 of his pamphlet, speaking of the reasons why the resources of Ireland are undeveloped, and famine and distress have come upon her:

These blessings she owes to the fact that the articles of union between Ireland and Great Britain, executed by Castlereagh and other Irish traitors, inflicted upon her that system of British free trade which is vindicated by the science based on assumptions.

Judge KELLEY ought to know, for it is the plainest page in history, that Ireland's woes came upon her before England adopted free trade, before Adam Smith wrote, and before Richard Cobden was born into the world.

Henry Giles, the same author from whom I have quoted, in a lecture on the spirit of Irish history, says: "Under the sway of Elizabeth Ireland lay in tempest and in waste." And further on, in the same lecture, speaking of the era from the death of Mary to that of James I:

While Europe was thus rejoicing in spreading grandeur, the fairest island on its western border, with every means of prosperity and glory, lay like a ruin at moonlight, where pirates had assembled to divide their plunder in blasphemy and blood.

I refer to another author, who deals in facts and figures. James J. Clancy, in Ireland as She Is, as She Has Been, and as She Ought to Be, published in 1877, in his seventh chapter shows why Ireland has no manufactures. He quotes the statutes passed in 1710, in 1732, in 1750, in 1765, in 1781, in 1785, and in 1789, by which England discouraged and prohibited manufactures in Ireland. The author, in the concluding paragraph of the chapter, says:

But have not most of these prohibitory statutes been repealed or allowed to lapse into dead letters? * * * Quite true; but deceptive. Where is the use of haltering a dead horse? He cannot run away.

And it is to such a carcass as this, leached by carpet-baggers, by landlordism and absenteeism, and finally starved to death by high taxes and prohibitory laws, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania appeals to justify him in imposing high taxes and prohibitory laws on free America. And he calls political economy that says Ireland ought to have had free manufactures, which she was denied; free export and import, which she was denied; free trade and fair play, which she was denied, a science based on assumptions.

His argument that Turkey was ruined by cheap British goods is just as unfounded and just as far-fetched. He says England made a treaty with Turkey in 1579 which "stipulated that the duty on British goods imported into Turkey should be fixed at 3 per cent.; and that provision, by subjecting the industries of Turkey to unrestricted British competition, wrought the overthrow of the power that had just threatened the conquest of Europe." Solyman the Magnificent, he says, twenty years before had caused all Western Europe to tremble at the tread of his armies. I venture to say that not a single historian can be found among all the three hundred thousand authors whose writings adorn our Congressional Library, who, writing simply to tell the truth of history and not for the purpose of vindicating a political theory, attributes the downfall of the power of Turkey to England's cheap goods.

Appleton's Encyclopedia says:

The reign of Solyman marks the zenith of the military power of Turkey, which began to decline after his death, his son, Selim II, being the first of the sultans who did not command the troops, but who led the life of a vuluptuary.

I suppose the gentleman will say that he loved cheap goods.

After conquering Cyprus he lost in 1571 the great naval battle of Lepanto. He was succeeded by a series of still more inefficient rulers, under which the janizaries became omnipotent, despite the decline of their military organization, and murders and conspiracies in the seraglios and revolts of pashas in remote provinces more and more frequent.

That is what the encyclopedia says. Then I have here another book, Blochwitz's History of Turkey. He shows in this history that the decline of Turkey began before the date 1579, that the causes existed during the reign of Solyman, and he quotes from the Turkish jurist Kotshibeg, who enumerates the causes of the decline of Turkey, beginning on page 74 of this history. This eminent Turkish jurist, undertaking to enumerate these causes, nowhere attributes them to such an insignificant and, I beg the gentleman's pardon for saying, such an absured cause as the cheap goods of England. Extravagance, immorality, ruinous and unlawful taxation, conspiracies, rebellions, assassinations, and the enervating tendencies of Mohammedanism, these were the inside influences. Wars with Russia and Austria and other European powers—these were the outside causes that combined finally to make Turkey the Sick Man of Europe. Now, if Henry C. Carey teaches that cheap goods wrought the ruin of Turkey, then no wonder, as the gentleman states, that his works have no place in the schools of America.

But perhaps the argument most relied on in this paper is, that Great Britain seeks to subjugate by diplomacy and cheap goods nations it cannot subdue by arms. This was one of the most powerful arguments used in the last Presidental campaign. I have been told by a gentleman from Illinois, who witnessed it himself, that clubs of farmers, who, the statistics show, were paying 40 per cent. tariff imposition on the very clothing they wore, actually carried banners bearing the inscription, "No free-trade for us." The argument was that British gold was being used to force on them cheap goods, and they did not propose to submit to the indignity. The Western Farmer of America, a pamphlet written by Augustus Mougredieu, a member of the Cobden Club, was being circulated among them to convince them that they were paying too high for their goods. This was said to be done by British gold to further British cupidity. When they see this tract of Judge KELLEY's circulated among them, paid for by American gold, to convince them that they should perpetuate a system that will compel them forever to pay high prices, what will they say? Mr. Chairman, that much maligned Cobden Club was formed to perpetuate the memory of Richard Cobden, who by the repeal of the corn-laws of England gave the right to our Western farmers to carry their corn and their wheat free of duty into England. It is a noble institution. Its motto is "Free-trade, peace, good-will among nations." It numbers among its honorary members many of the ablest, the broadest-minded, the most philanthropic and far-sighted men of America, belonging to both the great political parties. I hold the list in my hand. I need only cite such names as Charles Francis Adams, George Bancroft, S. S. Cox, Charles Nordhoff, Theodore Woolsey, William Lloyd Garrison, Carl Schurz, and James A. Garfield.

Judge KELLEY argued, and I state it as fairly as he can desire, that British manufacturers frequently sell their goods below cost in order to break down rival factories. That manufacturers in their greed for money do have a natural desire to shut out competition I am bound, as a believer in the political economy and in the ordinary motives that govern mankind, to admit. But, reasoning from the same postulate that manufacturers are governed by motives of self-interest, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania calls an assumption, I am bound also to conclude that they would not cut their own throats to kill off their rivals. I have known a merchant in a town of 2,500 inhabitants to attempt to kill off his rivals by selling goods for a season at a loss.

The result was when the season closed the consumers had enjoyed cheap goods; the merchant had lost money, and still had his rivals; so that he did not try it again. But I never heard of such an attempt being made in a large city; and I think that the argument certainly is not entitled to much weight that in the present condition of our industries, if we bring down our tariff and admit British goods for less duty than we do now, British manufacturers could afford so to cut down their prices for this country, when they are in competition with all the world, as to break down our industries.

Mr. Chairman, the advocates of protection will say to me that if we reduce the tariff the rising industries of the South, just beginning to flourish, will be stricken down. This argument, together with the statement that British manufacturers will flood the country with cheap goods, is leveled at all Southern and all Western Representatives to frighten them into sustaining a high tariff on their farming constituents, in order to build up manufactures in the South and West. Whence comes this new-born zeal for the industries of the West and the South? And would gentlemen have us believe that the persons engaged in these favored industries, when they express so much solicitude that we should engage in these same industries, are governed solely by motives of patriotism and brotherly affection? I am glad to admit, Mr. Chairman, that there is much kind feeling between the North and the South. I wish there was even more of it. But, sir, human nature is the same everywhere. Manufacturers in America consult their own interests just as manufacturers in England do.

If British manufacturers, because they have capital and are established, could afford to sell goods at a loss for such a length of time as would be necessary to break down American industries, and if it could be proved to me that they would do it, I should be very much afraid, as a friend of the rising industries of the South, to put up such a tariff as would permanently shut out all foreign competition, because, sir, I should fear that the old established manufactories of America, when this country was permanently fenced in by a fixed high tariff, would combine and break down all the weaker factories in order that they might have the whole field to themselves. With the moderate taxation necessary to raise revenue, judiciously distributed, we would secure such protection and such fair competition as would be at once an element of strength to our rising industries in the South and a safeguard against combinations of the strong to break down the weak.

Mr. Chairman, free competition always lessens the danger of combinations. When prohibitory and restrictive laws give to great establishments large profits, then they have the margin on which to break down their rivals—either to buy them out or crush them. And just here, sir, I wish to prove that the very association which pays its money to print this pamphlet I am answering has itself, as the agent of the Bessemer steel companies, been guilty of the very crime for which it arraigns British manufacturers; and I shall prove this, not by hearsay, but out of the unwilling mouth of its own witness. It is well known that these steel makers have been making immense profits. Protected from British competition by the high tariff they made something like 70 per cent. profit last year. When the profits they were making were not as large as they desired they actually paid the Vulcan Works not to manufacture steel.

I read from a printed report of hearings before the Ways and Means Committee in February, 1880. Dr. Felton, president of the association, was on the stand. Hon. Fernando Wood was chairman of the committee:

The CHAIRMAN. How long has it been since your association made an arrangement to close the Vulcan Iron Works at Saint Louis?

Mr. FELTON. We did not make any arrangement to close the Vulcan Works at Saint Louis at all. The Vulcan Works were bankrupt, I suppose, when they could not raise money to pay their men.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you intimate that Commodore Garrison was bankrupt?

Mr. FELTON. No, sir; I speak of the corporation, and not of the individuals composing it.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been alleged here that the works have been stopped through the operation of existing mills?

Mr. FELTON. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. State what you know on the subject.

Mr. FELTON. I only know that the Vulcan Works got into financial difficulty; were not able to pay their debts and were obliged to stop in consequence.

It appears here that Dr. Felton knew very little about "the subject." But Mr. CARLISLE renewed it. It will be noticed that he put his questions in a very searching manner, and then Dr. Felton did know something about the subject. I read from pages 59 and 60:

Mr. CARLISLE. I understood you to say in reply to a question put by the chairman that the association of which you are president has not furnished any moneys to compensate the Vulcan Iron Works at Saint Louis for remaining idle?

Mr. FELTON. No, sir; the association as such has not.

Mr. CARLISLE. Do you know anything as to whether the other mill-owners have furnished anything for that purpose?

Mr. FELTON. I will tell you the whole truth about that. The Vulcan Works, as I said, stopped in consequence of their inability from the profits of their work to pay their men and to pay their honest debts. While they were in that condition some of the other steel manufacturers took up the question in a pure business point of view, and agreed to pay a certain sum to the Vulcan Works to enable them to tide over the then hard times. They were under mortgage of a million dollars, the interest of which was about seventy thousand dollars a year, and they would have been sold out and sacrificed, and the property scattered to the four winds of heaven, the same as the Freedom Works in Pennsylvania were, if it had not been that other persons who were engaged in the same business came to their relief and paid them about seventy thousand dollars a year, by which the Vulcan Works paid the interest on their debt, saved their property, and were ready when the demand should be greater than the supply to start afresh.

Mr. CARLISLE. Was it or was it not a part of that agreement that the Vulcan Works should not operate within those years that they were being paid $70,000?

Mr. FELTON. They were to operate whenever the time came that the demand for steel rails was equal to the supply, (including the supply of the Vulcan Works,) and they were notified that they would receive this money no longer.

Mr. CARLISLE. That is, these other mill-owners have the right to notify the Vulcan Works that they may resume operation?

Mr. FELTON. Yes; and they have been notified.

Mr. CARLISLE. Was it not a part of the understanding that the other mill-owners should have a right to notify them?

Mr. FELTON. I do not know that there was any particular understanding about it, but that was done.

Mr. CARLISLE. How long were the Vulcan Works closed under that arrangement?

Mr. FELTON. Something over a year.

Thus these Bessemer steel companies were paying the Vulcan Works $70,000 a year to keep their mill idle and their laborers out of employment.

Now, sir, what became of these laborers—these people the gentleman from Pennsylvania is so anxious to protect, and who probably with their wives and little ones numbered at least 2,000? By these monopolists and capitalists who are protected by patents and a high tariff they were turned adrift, thrown out of employment to starve or beg employment elsewhere, and I have never yet heard the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise here and denounce them as unjust.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not think that Mr. S. M. Felton, not Dr. Felton, admitted that any payments had been made for the purpose of closing the Vulcan Works. They were in a bankrupt condition; and the company paid what would prevent their sale, until by a revival of trade the property should become valuable again. This is the same concern that the gentleman from Minnesota referred to when he said the other day he had been informed by a Saint Louis manufacturer of Bessemer rails that rails could be profitably manufactured under a duty of $14 per ton.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The bargain was that they were to pay a certain number of dollars per ton as long as they made no steel rails.

Mr. HERBERT. And it is admitted here that the Vulcan Works could not go to work so long as the $70,000 a year was paid and until notified that they might go on with work.

Mr. KELLEY. Not go on manufacturing at a loss until the whole property should be swamped.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman cannot get out of it in that way. Why should this company, if the manufacture was unprofitable, be paid for remaining idle? If the manufacture of Bessemer steel was a losing business, is it reasonable to suppose that these companies would squander $70,000 a year to prevent its manufacture?

Mr. KELLEY. Bessemer rails could be bought within $40 a ton, and there was no market at that time for either domestic or imported rails.

Mr. HERBERT. It is very strange, then, that they should have paid $70,000 for stopping a branch of manufacture in which there was no money at best.

Mr. KELLEY. Why, the gentleman from New York said the other day that for six successive years he had sunk $100,000 a year in his concern. Better to do that than let valuable property go to decay. But he said that in a single year afterward he had recouped all of his losses, as he hoped the Bessemer steel companies are doing.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. They have done it.

Mr. HERBERT. But here are Bessemer steel companies sinking $70,000 per annum in order to prevent another company from manufacturing at a loss. Is not that remarkable? [Mr. KELLEY rose.] Now, I cannot yield any further. I have but a few moments remaining.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not want the gentleman to yield. I only want to explain what seems to have been a misapprehension in his mind.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, I want to see the Southern manufactories freed from the danger of other establishments that by special privileges make so much money that they can buy out or crush out their rivals at pleasure. I am the friend of manufactories and iron industries in the South. But I do not believe it is necessary to rob other classes to build them up. With our natural advantages all they want is fair play. In the revision of the tariff I would give them fair play. I would not only pay regard to them in adjusting the tariff imposed for the collection of revenue, but I would put all machinery, every implement with which they carry on their work, on the free list, and I would not anywhere make such violent changes as to stop industries and throw laborers out of employment.

I want to elevate labor—all labor. We have in the South abundance of cotton and water-power and coal and iron and limestone and wood, everything necessary to diversify our industries. And we have cheap labor—aye, too cheap. I wish to raise wages, increase the purchasing power of wages by lifting the burdens from the back of the laborer. Why is it, Mr. Chairman, that labor at the South is so cheap? Why is it that the colored man who works in the field for money wages can get only $10 or $12 a month? It is not because of any combination against him. Planters bid against each other as much as they can afford to pay. Why is it that the white man or the black man who labors on his own farm winter and summer can scarcely make both ends meet? Our people cannot be said to be idle. They work day in and day out; yet they are not prosperous. The argument is made in almost every speech on this floor in favor of protection that this country is prosperous; and these gentlemen attribute this assumed prosperity to the high tariff. The fallacy of the argument as applicable to the West has already been pointed out.

Such prosperity as has come has come in spite of the Morrill tariff, just as it came in spite of pestilence and crime. We have been able to bear high taxes because our people have worked, because God has blessed our fertile lands with sunshine and rain, because of new and improved methods of farming, because everywhere the advancing intellect of man has invented machinery to help him labor and minister to his wants. These improvements have wonderfully increased man's productive capacity. It is a favorite pastime of gentlemen on this floor who advocate protection to select some articles which are cheaper now than they were twenty years ago and argue as if they were cheapened by high taxes instead of by machinery. But ask one of these gentlemen if he is willing to put these articles on the free list, and he will tell you no. He is unwilling to let in competition, because he knows you can get them cheaper still where there is no high tariff. But notwithstanding the increased producing capacity of man, the cost of the articles used in the family of the laboring man is higher in America to-day than twenty-five years ago. And this brings me to the proposition I regret to be obliged to assert, that the argument for protection based on the prosperity of the country is not true as to the South. Our farmers are not prosperous. They are scarcely in better condition to-day than they were ten years ago. Wages have risen very little; lands have advanced very little in value; and this is the test of the prosperity of a country. Lands which in 1860 were worth $40 an acre can be bought to-day for $10 an acre. Why is this?

We had no more manufactures then than we have now—not so many. We had no more diversity of interests and pursuits then than we have now. During the decade from 1850 to 1860 lands were continually rising in value. The country was in a prosperous condition. Men had only to go in debt judiciously, buying property on credit, and they got rich. Now debt hangs like a millstone about the neck. What is the cause of the difference? It cannot be attributed to the fact mentioned by the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. CHACE,] that a large amount of the precious metals was poured into the country, and the circulation much increased from 1850 to 1860. That is not the cause. The portion of that money we got at the South came from our cotton industry, as we depend mainly upon that now.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I move that the time of my colleague [Mr. HERBERT] be extended.

Mr. KASSON. How much more time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HERBERT. Twenty minutes.

Mr. KASSON. In view of the pressure put upon me, I desire very much that this debate shall go on without any extension of time; but as an extension was granted to my friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. CHACE,] I will not object in the present case, but suggest that the gentleman from Alabama accept the same additional time that was given to the gentleman from Rhode Island—fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to extending the time of the gentleman from Alabama for fifteen minutes? The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. HORR. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the fall in the value of real estate in the South was not brought about by the abolition of slave labor and by the general effects of the war?

Mr. HERBERT. I am glad the gentleman asked me the question, because it is a question I have prepared myself to answer. The result of the war did unsettle our labor system and depress values, but why should this continue for seventeen years? Why should we not have recuperated? Since the war we have made larger crops and received more money for them than before the war. I have had a table compiled by the chief of the Bureau of Statistics, who at my request has tabulated here, excluding the period of the war, the cotton production of the South from 1855–'56 to 1881, inclusive.

Mr. HORR. I admit all that; but did not this fall take place right after and during the war? Has it not been going up since that? Is not land higher than in 1868 in your country?

Mr. HERBERT. I think not. In 1868 and 1869 land was as high if not higher than to-day.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Do I understand my colleague to say that the war had no effect on the price of lands in Alabama?

Mr. HERBERT. No; I do not say so.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Do I understand him to say that the freeing of the colored man from slavery had no effect on the price of lands in the negro belt?

Mr. HERBERT. I do not say so. I will tell the gentleman what I do say, and that is this: that the principal industry before the war in the South was cotton, and the principal industry to-day is cotton——

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I should like to ask another question.

Mr. HERBERT. Let me get through with this and then you may ask me another question.

I admit fully the distress and depression that followed the war, but why have we not recovered? I want to state facts that will show why, facts that will demonstrate that the high prices a high tariff has compelled us to pay have kept the South poor. Our principal industry before the war was cotton. Now it is the same.

The table is as follows:

* Per pound of middling upland cotton at New York, gold values.
† Computed upon the basis of price of middling upland at New York.
‡ War periods.
NOTE.—The annual average price per pound is taken from "Cotton Movement and Fluctuations," prepared by Messrs. Latham, Alexander & Co., bankers and cotton commission merchants, New York.

The table I speak of gives the cotton crops and the prices realized from 1855 down to present time, gold values. I had it prepared to enable me to compare the amount of money received by the South for a given period before the war with that received since. Allowance is to be made for the fact that New York prices are given and low middling taken as the standard, but as the same standard is applied to both periods the table will serve for the purpose of comparison.

Where has all this money gone? Over four billions three hundred millions paid to the South for cotton since the close of the war! If we compare the six years preceding the war with the six years preceding this we find that, according to this table, the South received $397,882,089 more in the six years ending in August, 1881, than for the six years preceding the war. If we make allowance for the difference in Southern and New York prices and for the grade of low middling, which is above average, the sum cannot be below $330,000,000 for these six years. In other words, the South has received on an average $55,000,000 in gold every year for the last six years more than for the six years before the war. I repeat the question, Where has all this money gone?

These figures are absolutely appalling. The difference cannot be attributed to manufactories, because there were few then and we have more now. How, then, can you account for the difference? The farmers who made all this money have nothing to show for it, and if they have nothing to show for it they must have spent it. If they have spent it, then they have spent it in paying high prices for goods.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I should like to ask my colleague another question right there.

Mr. HERBERT. Very well; go on.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Do not the farmers or planters in the South get as high prices for cotton now as before the war?

Mr. HERBERT. This table will show.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I want to know what implements the farmer purchases in the South he pays more for now than he did before the war?

Mr. HERBERT. All I have to say in reply to that is that any farmer in the West or any farmer in the South knows, and no gentleman on this floor can convince him differently, that his average expenses have been higher since than before the war.

Mr. HORR. The gentleman's exhibit is a flattering one, I think, but is not this the reason why you have not any surplus? Have you not divided the proceeds of the cotton sold among the hundreds or thousands of men who raised it more equitably, whereas from 1855 to 1860 it went into the pockets of a few planters, and the men who did the work did not get anything? They did not get any wages.

Mr. HERBERT. So far as that is concerned practically all the people of the South, bond and free, were supported by cotton before the war. All, white and black, have been supported by cotton since the war. There was a surplus before the war and the South prospered; there is none now and the South is not prospering. It does not matter, for the purposes of my argument, who spent this money—whether the blacks had a larger share of it than when they were slaves or not. It has been spent, and I am speaking for the black man as well as the white man. I want them all protected—while we are talking about protection—I want them protected against high-tariff prices. As I said, the money to the South for cotton since the war in gold amounts, according to this table, to more than $4,321,000,000. If we make a liberal allowance for the difference between the price in New York and in the home markets, and for the fact that cotton does not average low middling, and deduct seven hundred and twenty-one millions for these causes, then we have fully three billions six hundred millions received by the South in gold for cotton in the period since the war—and spent, gone, with nothing to show for it. How much of this is attributable to the high tariff that is lauded as such a blessing? The distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] in his carefully prepared estimate made on this floor recently, calculated the increased cost of living to the laborer attributable to the tariff at 32 per cent. And what is 32 per cent. of $3,600,000,000? Just $1,152,000,000. If we allow $100,000,000 for debts paid to the North, due at the close of the war, and $152,000,000 for fertilizers, we have $900,000,000, equal to the value of three large cotton crops. Another deduction should be made. The South consumed a large amount of Western corn and bacon before the war, but it has consumed more since. I have no means of estimating this excess of such consumption accurately, but suppose we put it at $200,000,000 and deduct this from the $900,000,000. Then we would have $700,000,000 as the extra price the farmers of the South paid by reason of the present tariff. In other words, but for this tariff every person in the South might have eaten exactly what he has eaten, worn exactly what he has worn, consumed everything he has consumed for the past seventeen years, and the savings would have been $700,000,000. This sum, I estimate roughly, would build ten times as many factories and foundries as there are in the South, and farmers would own stock in these factories. The colored laborers in the field might have saved out of their earnings money enough to buy their own stock and make themselves comfortable at home. I know, Mr. Chairman, that an increase in taxes has been necessary to pay our war debt, but I am answering the argument that protection develops the country and showing where the development comes from; and it is the fact that not more than one dollar out of four taken by this Morrill tariff out of the pocket of the consumer ever goes to the Government. The Government gets nothing for the increased price paid on articles manufactured in the United States; and it is the fact that the consumer, until competition among the favored classes brings down the prices, always pays the increased price. I will mention one fact that proves this absolutely. The duty on Bessemer steel rails is $28 per ton. General John C. Brown, vice-president of the Texas and Pacific Railroad, recently stated in this city that steel rails from England were being delivered over his road, on Mexican soil, at Laredo, for $40 per ton, and that his road, an American enterprise, could not lay down steel rails at El Paso, with 300 miles less transportation, for less than $67 per ton; that engines were being delivered at Laredo at $10,500 each, and the same engines delivered on American soil at El Paso cost $15,500 each.

The same thing is true to a greater or less extent of all the articles on which a tariff is laid. We have a tariff that lays burdens on all consumers unnecessarily and invidiously, by taxing, practically without exception, everything they consume except their own productions.

The Constitution imposes on us who were elected by the people the duty of making laws and amending laws. Why cannot we amend the tariff laws? I represent farmers, and mechanics, and railroad employés, and other consumers. It is my duty to look to their interests. All they want, all they demand, is justice. They have no lobby members here. The consumers, the persons who have no especial privileges, who have no prohibitive laws enacted in their favor, constitute seven-tenths of the people of this country, and they only demand that legislation shall be fair and just to all. The manufacturers have their representatives here, and together we could if we would enact a tariff law that would be just and fair to all classes and grant to none privileges that would be oppressive to others. But those who advocate this bill say that the subject is so difficult that we should not undertake it, that we have not the necessary information, that the President must appoint a commission of nine to inquire into the facts and report to us and tell us how to legislate. Mr. Chairman, if we are not competent to legislate on this subject we should resign our commissions and say to the people who sent us here, "Send others in our places; send those who can understand and perform the duties imposed on them." Information, gentlemen say, we want. Why, what was the census taken for? Why did we spend nearly $4,000,000 of the people's money if it was not to get information to enable us to legislate intelligently?

The census of 1880 was in many respects the most comprehensive and complete that ever was taken in any country. At the head of it was General Francis A. Walker, a man too scientific, too learned to be anything else in theory but a free-trader. But at the same time he was so able and so pure a man that his appointment was satisfactory to all parties. He had been connected with the Census Department of the Government for more than ten years. He had a thorough acquaintance with the leading men of all industries in all parts of our country. He subdivided the subjects of inquiry and appointed at the head of each the best men he could select. No man will dare to say that Professor Pumpelly and Clarence King were not competent to take the statistics of mining industries; that Professor Waring was not competent to take the statistics of cities; that James M. Swank, the secretary of the Iron and Steel Association, was not competent to take the statistics of iron and steel; and that those who took all the statistics of all the industries and all the resources were not competent to the tasks assigned to them. Those tasks have been performed; the information has been obtained; it is at hand. Why do we not utilize it?

Gentlemen say that the details are not given; that we do not know what effect a duty on this or that article may have on our manufacturing interests. If we need any information on these questions we have only to open our doors. The men who are sending around these pamphlets to indoctrinate us will be on hand to give us their views. We will not lack for what they can tell us. Our difficulty will lie in the other direction, to watch and see that the farmer, the mechanic, the laborer, the artisan, all the great masses of the people, have fair play.

Mr. Chairman, I would rather trust to information gathered by a committee of members of Congress, chosen by the people and responsible to the people, than to information gathered by a committee appointed by the President.

Mr. Chairman, all who are in favor of a high protective tariff favor this bill. Why is this? Do they vote for a commission the labors of which they expect will result in changing this tariff in the interest of the consumer? I say, no, sir. The strength of our tariff is not in its merits, nor in its excellence, but in the combinations it has formed. Why was it that when we arraigned this system on the floor of this House in the Forty-fifth Congress and attempted reform it escaped the condemnation of Congress? It was because there were "too many of the jury who had some of the beef." I do not mean to assail the motives or the honor of gentlemen then or now upon this floor. I do not mean that any of them were bribed. I do not believe they were. But too many members represented these favored interests, interests that by this tariff law were protected against competition. Salt men wanted high prices for salt, sugar producers wanted high prices for sugar, and so with the producers of hundreds of articles. Capital that represents and owns great industries is always intelligent, always vigilant, always active in pushing its interests. It takes a part in primary meetings, in nominating conventions, and in elections. It not only sends around pamphlets, but sometimes it sends men and money into Congressional districts.

Four years ago I had the honor to make a speech here against a scheme that was intended to bind the people and this Government for $38,000,000. By the corporation that was asking the subsidy, men and money were sent into the district I had the honor to represent to influence public sentiment against the views I contended for. It may be that this will be repeated now by those whose views I am opposing, and it may be with effect. But whenever I retire from public life I shall bear with me to my home among the people the proud consciousness that on every measure I have voted to give the people, the consumers, rich and poor, white and black, fair play in the race of life by attempting to rid them of unequal and unjust taxation.

But this is a digression. I was endeavoring to show that the strength of the system fastened on us by this war tariff lay not in its excellence but in the varied interests it could call to its support. We saw the same thing in the Forty-sixth Congress. Then we attempted to attack the system in detail; but except in the single instance of quinine we failed. The tax on scarcely a single leading article could have stood on its own merits; but the protected interests saw their danger and combined. In this combination lies the strength of the system.

Does any gentleman seriously believe that when this commission, which is to be voted for by every protectionist on this floor, makes a report, the protectionist will throw away any of the support on which the high protective tariff has heretofore relied for its continuance? I believe the protectionists will control the commission; that it will report in favor of reducing some of the more glaring abuses and reconciling some of the inconsistencies of the present system, but that it will seek to fasten on us a very high tariff as a permanency; and that to accomplish this and gain strength it will extend the tax to articles not now taxed and increase the tax on others.

Why, sir, only last week a resolution was read in this House, passed by the Kentucky hemp-growers, that, while they were opposed to protection, if the system was to be continued, they wanted protection for their hemp; in other words, while the beef was going they wanted some of it too. Other interests are sending up petitions of similar import almost daily. Will those who are seeking to fasten their system perpetually on the American people neglect these sources of strength? Sir, I warn the farmers of the North and of the West and of the South, who cannot have protection because they must export and must sell their corn and their wheat and their meats and their cotton partly in foreign markets and compete with foreign products, that they cannot expect relief at the hands of this commission, but that they must expect additional burdens to be imposed upon them and taxes to be placed on articles now on the free list.

There is no relief, sir, and there can be none for the people except at the ballot-box, and I trust that next November they will speak out in a voice that will be heeded in these halls, and that they will demand a reform of the tariff and a reduction of duties, not from a commission which will visit the manufacturers in their splendid homes, and ask what other interests shall be taken into the combination that now exists to keep up a high tariff, but from representatives sent here and charged with the duty of seeing that this free people shall have freer trade and fairer play in the markets of the world.

TARIFF COMMISSION.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt to make any reply to the very able and very eloquent speech of my colleague, [Mr. HERBERT.] In much that he has said I agree with him. In part I disagree, and in the course of my remarks I will call attention to that part of his speech from which I dissent.

Mr. Chairman, it has been admitted by all who have addressed the committee on this subject that the tariff ought to be revised and readjusted at as early a day as practicable. The present Morrill tariff thus far has had no defenders here. Twenty years have passed since it was enacted. Since then great changes in productions and prices have occurred. What then may have been a judicious tariff is now a very unjust one. The public burdens it imposes are unequal and in many cases are unnecessarily onerous.

The people everywhere of every interest demand its readjustment. When I entered the Forty-fourth Congress this tariff was one of the principal questions presented for the consideration of the representatives of the people. Then the party to which I have the honor to be an humble member had almost a two-thirds majority in this House. The Ways and Means Committee of the Forty-fourth Congress was not organized in the interest of protection. The distinguished gentleman, Mr. MORRISON, of Illinois, was at its head, and he was ably aided by the late Fernando Wood, of New York, and the accomplished and distinguished gentleman from Virginia, Mr. TUCKER.

The Forty-fourth Congress expired, leaving the Morrill tariff in force, with all of its unequal and unjust burdens. The national Democracy met in convention in Saint Louis in 1876, and declared for a tariff for revenue. The Forty-fifth Congress was subsequently elected and organized with a Democratic Speaker, and with a majority of fifteen or twenty upon this floor, the country and the Democratic party still demanding a revision of the tariff. The Forty-fifth Congress expired without a readjustment of our tariff system. The Forty-sixth Congress was also organized with a Democratic Speaker, and there was a Democratic majority in both Houses. The country was still demanding relief from the Morrill tariff. The question was again referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. It was not able to agree upon a report.

A Democratic Senate after having waited long for action upon the part of the House passed what is known as the Eaton commission bill, which was in all material respects the same as the one now under consideration, and sent it to this House for its approval. The gentlemen who now clamor for an early revision of the tariff refused, or at least failed to pass the Eaton bill, and the Forty-sixth Congress adjourned without effecting any revision of the tariff.

If we on this side of the House were not able to pass a bill for a revision of the tariff when we had control of the House for three successive Congresses, how do we now expect to accomplish it when we are in a minority in both Houses? Had the Forty-sixth Congress passed the Eaton bill, we might by this time have passed a bill readjusting our revenue system so as to equalize the public burdens in the interest of our toiling people. And now, when it is again apparent that there can be no action taken by this House toward any revision of this iniquitous tariff until the necessary or alleged necessary information is procured through a commission, gentlemen who claim to be for early action propose to repeat the folly of the Forty-sixth Congress and thereby aid, unintentionally though it may be, those who do not want any reform in our revenue system.

If we take no action, as the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, and Forty-sixth Congresses did, we leave the tariff undisturbed. If we pass this bill, though it may not be what we would prefer, it is at least a step in the direction of the object we desire to accomplish. Its passage now may, and probably will, enable us to intelligently and wisely readjust the tariff during the next session, so as to equalize the public burdens and to give the necessary encouragement to our productive industries, and thereby promote every interest in the whole Union.

It is clear and indisputable that neither this House as a body nor the Ways and Means Committee, at this late day, can perform the labor of an intelligent revision of the tariff during this session. Therefore, whatever may have been the intention of the authors of this measure, whether for delay or otherwise, it is now beyond all controversy a measure in the interest of expedition rather than delay of revenue reform.

Gentlemen may charge that this measure is for delay, but the country, looking at the past history of the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, and Forty-sixth Congresses, will not so interpret it. I will not charge that any member of this House favors delay for the purpose of keeping the question before the country for political purposes, but I fear there are those elsewhere who are anxious that nothing shall be done, so that a purely business question may be made a political issue in 1884.

The extreme protectionists on the other side declare that it is a political question, in order to drive with the party lash revenue-tariff Republicans of the West to the support of their views. And there are those on this side of the House who take the other extreme, who desire to make it a party issue so as to force those of their party who take a medium ground and who stand firmly by the teachings of the fathers of Democracy to the support of their free-trade heresy. With these gentlemen on either side, I fear, it matters not how much the business interests of the country may suffer or how long the people may groan under unnecessary burdens so they forward their respective party interests. I am a Democrat from principle; but I protest against any attempt here or elsewhere to make this question a party issue.

It is the interest of the country as well as the interest of the Democratic party that this question shall be kept out of party politics, and that it shall be finally settled upon a basis just to all the interests of the country at as early a day as practicable. I do not agree with those gentlemen who say that this bill is unconstitutional. I deny their premises. It delegates no legislative power to the commission. It proceeds solely upon the idea that in order to effect a judicious revision of the tariff this House should have certain information relating thereto. It therefore sends out a commission, not to make a law to lay and collect taxes, but to gather up information for the guidance of Congress when it comes to execute the powers conferred upon it by the Constitution.

I therefore see no constitutional objection to the bill. I vote for this measure, not because I prefer it to an immediate revision of the tariff by the House, but because I am satisfied that its defeat would delay all revision until the Forty-eighth Congress. It is my ardent desire to relieve my people from unjust and unnecessary burdens which impels me to vote for this measure.

I here and now repeat that every gentleman on this floor who desires an early settlement of this question ought to support this bill. I am unwilling, Mr. Chairman, to take my seat until I shall have defined my position on the tariff. I am neither for a tariff for protection nor for a tariff for revenue only. I do not deny the power of Congress to protect the productive industries of this country. I dissent from my friends on this side of the House who deny this power. Nor do I agree with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] who the other day, while ably and eloquently discussing this question, asserted that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] was the first who had ever declared for a tariff for protection and incidental revenue.

If the eloquent gentleman had been well posted in the early history of Congressional legislation and debates he would not probably have fallen into that mistake. The first man who advocated a tariff for protection without even incidental revenue was a Democrat from the good old Commonwealth of Virginia in the First Congress after the adoption of the present Constitution. On the 15th day of May, 1789, while a bill was pending in the Congress of the United States laying duties on goods, Mr. Bland, of Virginia, probably a relative of our Mr. BLAND, said:

He thought that very little revenue was likely to be collected from the importation of this article, [beef,] and as it was to be had in sufficient quantities in the United States, perhaps a tax amounting to prohibition would be proper.—Lloyd's Debates of Congress, volume 1, page 97.

Here a Virginian advocated a prohibitory tariff for the protection of growers of beef cattle.

Mr. Sinnickson on the same day declared himself a friend to the manufacturer of beer, and thought if a duty was laid high enough to effect prohibition the manufacture would increase and of consequence the price would be lessened. (Lloyd's Debates.)

Here we have the doctrine of a prohibitory tariff for protection asserted, because it was thought by Mr. Sinnickson that such a duty would stimulate the production of beer in this country, and thereby, under the idea that supply and demand govern prices, the supply being greatly increased, the price would fall notwithstanding the tariff. It was well for Mr. Sinnickson's reputation that this old fogy doctrine of supply and demand regulating prices was asserted before such men as Madison and his compeers in the First Congress, for if he had uttered such nonsense in this House he would have been subjected to the ridicule of the free-trader on this floor.

The old Democracy understood how prices could be reduced by stimulating the production of commodities by a tariff, and he who will carefully read the history of the tariff and its effect upon prices will see how it has constantly and gradually reduced the prices of all manufactured articles in our country, while the products of the farm are to-day higher than they were in 1860. Those who study the tariff from books and the science of political economy, and who never stop to look at its practical effects upon the country, cannot see how a tariff upon an article can reduce its price.

I have, however, digressed from the line of my argument. This doctrine of a tariff for protection only was asserted in the presence of Mr. Madison, who had taken a leading part in the convention which had framed the Federal Constitution, and who, like our friend, the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] was a strict constructionist of that instrument, and he did not dissent therefrom. The great apostle of Democracy declared that—

To cultivate peace, maintain commerce and navigation, to foster our fisheries, and protect manufactures adapted to our circumstances, are the landmarks to guide ourselves in all our relations.

Such was the language of Mr. Jefferson in his message of 1802. But, lest gentlemen may say that Mr. Jefferson did not mean to give protection by custom duties, I will quote again from his message of 1808.

Speaking of manufactures, he said:

And little doubt remains that establishments formed and forming will, under the auspices of cheaper materials and subsistence, the freedom of labor from taxation with us—

And mark the language—and protecting duties and prohibitions, become permanent.

Here we see the great founder of the Democratic party advocated duties on imports, not for revenue only, nor even for revenue, but for protection and the encouragement of our domestic industries.

Mr. Madison also advocated the protective system, and wrote a strong letter, in 1828, to his friend Joseph C. Cabell, maintaining the constitutionality of a protective tariff. I will print his letter in full as an appendix to my remarks, and I will ask those gentlemen who in this debate have denied the constitutional power of Congress to protect our home industries, to a careful consideration of that letter. Mr. Madison says:

The power to protect our productive industries is proved by the use made of the power for that object in the first session of the First Congress under the Constitution, when among the members present were so many who had been members of the Federal Convention which framed the Constitution and of the State conventions which ratified it.

* * * * * * *

It does not appear from the printed proceedings of Congress on that occasion that the power was denied by any of them.

* * * * * * *

A further evidence of the constitutional power to protect and foster manufactures by regulations of trade, an evidence that ought of itself to settle the question, is the uniform practical sanction given to the power by the General Government for nearly forty years; with the concurrence or acquiescence of every State government throughout the same period, and it may be added through all the vicissitudes of party which marked the period. No novel construction, however ingeniously devised or however respectable and patriotic its patrons, can withstand the weight of such authorities or the unbroken current of so prolonged and universal a practice. And well it is that this cannot be done without the intervention of the same authority which made the Constitution. If it could be done there would be an end to stability of government and laws.

* * * * * * *

And may it not be fairly left to the unbiased judgment of all men of experience and of intelligence to decide which is the most to be relied on for a sound and safe test of the meaning of the Constitution, a uniform interpretation by all the successive authorities under it, commencing with its birth and continued for a long period through a varied state of political contests; or the opinion of every new legislature heated as it may be by the strife of parties or warped, as often happens, by the eager pursuit of some favorite object or carried away possibly by the powerful eloquence or captivating addresses of a few popular statesmen, themselves perhaps influenced by the same misleading causes. If the latter test is to prevail every new legislative opinion might make a new constitution as the foot of every new chancellor would make a new standard of measure.

The power is expressly conferred upon Congress to lay and collect taxes, impost duties, and excises, by the Constitution. It is said, however, that this is a power to tax for the purpose of raising revenue for the support of the Government, and not to give protection to any industry. That I shall not question; but every nation has the unquestioned right under international law to exclude foreign goods from its markets, or to prescribe upon what terms they may be admitted. Says Chancellor Kent:

Every nation has the right and is disposed to exercise it of judging for itself in respect to the policy and extent of its commercial arrangements. The general freedom of trade, however reasonably and strongly it may be inculcated in the modern school of political economy, is but an imperfect right, and necessarily subject to such regulations and restrictions as each nation may think proper to prescribe for itself. Every State may monopolize as much as it pleases of its own internal trade, or may grant to other nations with whom it deals distinctions and particular privileges as it may deem most conducive to its own interest.

Here the broad doctrine is asserted of the right of every nation to prescribe the terms upon which it will trade or permit its citizens to trade with other nations. This power includes, undoubtedly, the right to lay customs duties beyond the revenue standard for protection. But it may be said that the United States is not a nation. In part I admit this is true. In its relation to the States it is not national but federal; in its relation, however, to foreign governments it is national and not federal, possessing all the powers in this respect which the States held prior to the adoption of the Constitution.

Each of the thirteen original States were sovereign nations, possessing the power to exclude foreign goods or to admit them upon such terms as each might deem most conducive to its own interests, and each had exercised this right. This undoubted power was by each of these States delegated to the General Government by the ratification of the Federal Constitution, by that clause which confers upon Congress the right to regulate trade or commerce with all foreign nations, thus conferring the power upon the Federal Government of admitting foreign goods upon such terms as it may deem most conducive to its own interests.

The power of Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations is unrestricted and as broad as the subject to which it relates.

The power—

Says the Supreme Court of the United States—is complete in itself, and may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than those which are prescribed in the Constitution.

What is commerce? The Supreme Court of the United States says that "it comprehends intercourse for the purpose of trade in any and all its forms, including the transportation, purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities of citizens of one country and the citizens or subjects of other countries, and between citizens of different States."

The power to regulate commerce clearly confers the power to levy protective duties. In this view I am supported by Madison and Jefferson, Jackson and Story. President Jackson, in his second message to Congress, December 7, 1830, speaking of the power of Congress to lay protective duties, said:

The power to impose duties on imports originally belonged to the several States. The right to adjust these duties with the view to the encouragement of the domestic branches of industry is so completely identical with that power that it is difficult to suppose the existence of the one without the other. The States have delegated their whole authority over imports to the General Government, without limitation or restriction, saving the very inconsiderable reservation relating to their inspection laws. This authority having thus entirely passed from the States, the right to exercise it for the purpose of protection does not exist in them, and consequently if it be not possessed by the General Government it must be extinct. Our political system would thus present the anomaly stripped of the right to foster their own industry and to counteract the most selfish and destructive policy which might be adopted by foreign nations. This surely cannot be the case; this indispensable power thus surrendered by the States must be within the scope of the authority on this subject expressly delegated to Congress.

Mr. Story, in speaking of the power of Congress to lay protective duties under the power to regulate trade, says:

If ever, therefore, contemporaneous exposition and the uniform and progressive operations of the Government itself in all its departments can be of any weight to settle the construction of the Constitution, there never has been and there never can be more decided evidence in favor of the power than is furnished by the history of our national laws for the encouragement of domestic agriculture and manufactures. To resign an exposition so sanctioned would be to deliver over the country to interminable doubts, and to make the Constitution not a written system of government, but a false and delusive text upon which every successive age of speculatist and statesman might build any system suited to their own views and opinions. But if it be added to this that the Constitution gives the power in the most unlimited terms, and neither assigns motives nor objects for its exercise, but leaves these wholly to the discretion of the legislature acting for the common good and general interest, the argument in its favor becomes as absolutely irresistible as any demonstration of a moral of political nature ever can be. Without such a power the Government would be absolutely worthless, and made merely subservient to the policy of foreign nations, incapable of self-protection or self-support; with it the country will have the right to assert its equality and dignity and sovereignty among the other nations of the earth.

Mr. Monroe also favored a protective tariff. "It is deemed," said he, "of importance to encourage our domestic manufactures." We have heard much during this debate about an unrestricted commerce. Hear what Mr. Monroe said on the same subject:

Satisfied I am, whatever may be the abstract doctrine in favor of an unrestricted commerce, provided all nations would concur in it, and it was not liable to be interrupted by war, which has never occurred and cannot be expected, that there are strong reasons applicable to our situation and relations with other countries which impose on us the obligation to cherish and sustain our manufactures.

"I recommend," said Mr. Monroe, "a revision of the tariff for the purpose of affording such additional protection to those articles which we are prepared to manufacture or which are immediately connected with the defense and independence of the country." (Message of December, 1823.)

Thus it will be seen, Mr. Chairman, that the four first and greatest of the Democratic Presidents, supported by the great constitutional expounder, Story, asserted the authority of Congress to protect the domestic industries of the country and approved the policy of a protective tariff, or what is now called by some gentlemen on this floor the public plunder or robber policy.

If a protective tariff be robbery, then Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Jackson, Monroe, Clay, Webster, and Calhoun were robbers, for they have all supported the protective system. He that denounces this system as robbery and public plunder necessarily implicates every gentleman who has supported or who now supports the protective system as a robber and public plunderer. It will be hard to convince the people of Virginia, at least, that Madison and Monroe were public plunderers. The people of Tennessee will require strong and irresistible evidence before they will believe that the old hero of New Orleans was a robber. The mere declarations of a thousand honorable Congressmen would not satisfy the American people that the immortal George Washington had ever supported a measure of public plunder.

While I am no defender of the present Morrill tariff, yet I protest most earnestly against this wholesale denunciation, not of the Morrill tariff, but of the protective system as robbery and public plunder. I enter my protest against the denunciation of a system which was organized and put in operation by that great party which controlled the legislation and administered the laws of this country for seventy-five years. The history of this party from Jefferson till its overthrow by the Republican party in 1860 is full and replete with great measures for the country's good; but none has promoted the general prosperity of the country to a greater extent than the system of protection of American labor and American industries recommended by Jefferson, inaugurated by Madison, confirmed by Monroe, and reaffirmed by Jackson. These great men being Americans devoted themselves to the interest of America, and not of England or any other foreign government.

The decisions of the Supreme Court which have been cited by gentlemen on this floor and at the other end of the Capitol to prove that a protective tariff is unconstitutional, not one of them touches the question at issue. All these decisions are predicated on cases arising under State tax laws, and not one has any application to our protective tariff system. I shall not stop to review these decisions, for I am sure no lawyer would quote them as authority against the views which I have presented of the constitutional authority of Congress to levy protective duties under the power to regulate trade.

Mr. Chairman, while I maintain the right of Congress to lay duties for protection under the power to regulate trade, and while I approve of the protective policy of Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and Jackson, when necessary to protect our industries against the pauper labor of England or elsewhere, I do not advocate a protective tariff at this time, because I believe that so long as we have to raise $200,000,000 or more of revenue from customs duties, a revenue tariff judiciously adjusted in its details will give adequate protection to all our interests.

Mr. Chairman, I do not favor a tariff for revenue only. A tariff for revenue only, if the word "only" has any signification whatever, means a tariff discriminating against our domestic manufactures. It is a tariff adjusted and arranged in its details solely and exclusively for revenue. It is a tariff laid on such articles and commodities as are not manufactured or produced in this country, and which we are compelled to purchase from abroad. It means a transfer to the free list of all kinds of iron, steel, cotton, and woolen goods, and in fact everything which we manufacture or produce in this country, and laying duties on tea, coffee, &c. I am opposed to such a tariff because it is both anti-democratic and anti-American.

The State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor is exceedingly rich in iron, coal and copper. She has over five thousand square miles of the best bituminous coal, which is just now beginning to be mined and worked. Located in Alabama is the most wonderful mineral curiosity on the American continent—an iron mountain extending from within a few miles of Tuscaloosa to the northeastern part of the State, over one hundred miles in length. The iron and coal of Alabama are inexhaustible. There the world might be supplied for many hundred years with coal and iron if they were properly worked.

For the last two years capital from abroad has been invested in the iron and coal industries there. The city of Birmingham, located in the center of this great and wonderful mineral region, has sprung up like magic and bids fair in a few years to rival Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. There has been put in operation in this city in the last year and a half two large coke furnaces, and two or three others are now in process of construction. Within six miles of Birmingham there are two other large coke furnaces in full blast. Many men of capital and skilled workmen are being attracted thither from all portions of the United States and Europe. Cotton factories are also being put in operation in different portions of the State. All these industries are in their infancy and embryo and need the care and protection of the Federal Government. The General Government has for many years given protection to New England and the Middle States. Their manufactures have taken deep root and are established upon a firm foundation. They may be able to stand alone but the infant establishments of Alabama need to lean upon the strong arm of the Federal Government for a few years at least. Mr. Chairman, adopt a tariff for revenue only, discriminating against these infant manufactures, and refuse them that incidental protection which a tariff for revenue properly adjusted would give them, and you most effectually destroy them.

I present to this committee the infant establishments of Alabama like those which the great Kentuckian, Henry Clay, so eloquently urged the country to protect and foster; the same like infant establishments which Madison and Jefferson recommended to the fostering care of the Government. The great establishments of the North do not need this protection; but withdraw it from the infant establishments of Alabama by your tariff for revenue only and they could not, I fear, weather the storm.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, for I do not wish to be misunderstood, I do not favor a tariff for protection. I shall support a tariff for revenue adjusted and arranged in its details so as to equalize as far as possible the public burdens, but discriminating in favor of American labor and American productions so as to give them adequate protection, yet harmonizing, as far as practicable, the agricultural, mining, manufacturing, commercial, and mercantile interests. All these different interests are of great importance, and should have equally the fostering care of the Government. In laying discriminating duties I would, however, be careful not to lay them to benefit the wealthy to the detriment of the laboring-men, by taxing lowest articles used by the rich and highest those consumed by the poor.

The burdens of government should be equally distributed among all classes of our people so far as it can be done, and if any discriminations are made at all they should be made in the interest of the poorer class. It has been alleged in this discussion that the agricultural interest has not received that attention and care from the Government which have been bestowed on the manufacturing interest. This complaint is urged more by the politicians than by the farmers, though doubtless there is some cause for it. The Government protects many of the products of the farm which I will not stop to enumerate, as it has been done by others during this debate.

In 1789, when the cotton planter needed, or was supposed to need, protection from foreign competition, Congress did not hesitate to give him protection at the rate of 3 cents per pound on his cotton. While all manufactured goods and implements used in agriculture are much lower than in 1860, the products of the farm through protection command as high or higher prices now than they did then. What the farmers need in Alabama and elsewhere is the establishment of manufactures alongside of their farms, so as to give them a market at their own doors for all they have to sell and all they wish to buy.

The farmers of Alabama are as much interested in the development of the coal and iron interest and the establishment of cotton factories and other industries in the State as any other class of persons. The agricultural interest flourishes best in those States where there are the most manufactures. There is no doubt of this. The last census report demonstrates it beyond all controversy. I have no personal interest in manufactures. I have not a dollar invested in any industry save agriculture. I was born and reared on a farm. I know the wants of the farmers of my district, and I would not advocate any measure I believed would be unjust to them.

I recognize the fact that "a flourishing agricultural population is the very basis of the prosperity of the nation," but agriculture cannot flourish alone. No purely agricultural people can prosper, as the farmers of Alabama can verify from sad experience. "The variety of occupation open to the people utilizes all human gifts and talents. Let agriculture have manufacturing industry side by side, and you have everywhere occupation fit for everybody. Here is appropriate employment for stolid strength, for manual skill and dexterity, for inventive genius, for the active and sedentary, for childhood, youth, and mature age."

Thus it will be seen how manufactures prove beneficial to agriculture. They reduce the prices, as I have said, of all manufactured articles which the farmer has to consume, and increase the prices of all the products of the farm, as well as the value of the farm itself.

My colleague [Mr. HERBERT] asked the question, why the farmers in Alabama were not prosperous? If he had opened his eyes and looked around him, if he had gone to New England and Pennsylvania and seen how the farmers prosper there, that would have given him the answer. They have prospered because they had manufactures around them, and they have a market at their door for all they have to sell and all they have to buy.

The reason why the farmers of the South are not prosperous is, they have to pay the expense of shipping their cotton to New England to be spun in New England mills, or to England, and then have to pay the freight back on everything they consume. That takes off the profit, and that is why they are growing poorer and poorer every year.

Mr. KELLEY. While the gentleman pauses for a moment I would like to ask him whether the diversification of our industries has not nearly doubled the value of the cotton crop by the grinding of it into oil and oil-cake?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I should think it has. There is no doubt that it has added much to the value of the cotton crop. I think if we had an unrestricted commerce, and turned all these people that are working in the mines and in manufactories loose and put them in the cotton-fields, England would have cheap cotton.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. May I ask the gentleman from Alabama a question?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. If you take away protection from New England manufacturers, would not Southern manufacturers get a decided advantage by reason of the saving in transportation of the raw and manufactured materials?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. We have that advantage with or without protection. My opinion is, the Southern manufacturer needs protection a great deal more than the New England manufacturer. The old idea was that infant establishments needed protection. That was the idea of Henry Clay, whose words have been quoted in this debate. That is the doctrine of every gentleman who has spoken. Gentlemen who have supported what they term free trade have acknowledged that when you had your infant establishments you needed protection. I ask my friends if the establishments in the South are not in that condition? New England has had the protection of the Government for one hundred years, and now when the South is about to receive some of the benefits of protection Southern Representatives reject it.

A tariff for revenue, discriminating in favor of manufacturing interests, will prove a blessing to the farmers of Alabama, as it has to those of Pennsylvania and other States of the Union.

I deny most emphatically that the consumer pays all the duties which are laid on the goods consumed by him. In many cases the American goods can be purchased here as cheap as in England, notwithstanding the tariff. Suppose the duty on coarse cotton goods was 50 cents per yard, does any one believe the consumer would have to pay 50 cents per yard for such goods?

The price would not be regulated by the amount of the duty, but by the cost of production and supply and demand. So with any other article. Cut nails bear a duty of 1½ cents a pound; yet cut nails sell as cheaply here as in England.

Mr. HERBERT. May I ask my colleague a question?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. HERBERT. If that is the case, what is the use of any tariff any longer?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I answer my colleague's question in this way: it is necessary to prevent England in times of depression of trade from throwing her surplus productions, which she cannot sell elsewhere, upon our market at prices far below the cost of their production and thereby cripple, if not totally destroy, our home industries.

Mr. HERBERT. How can England throw anything upon our market when we already undersell her, according to your statement?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. England can afford to sell her surplus products, which in times of depression of trade cannot be sold elsewhere at prices below cost. And in addition to this I will say to my colleague that a tariff, in the language of Andrew Jackson, in such case is necessary "to counteract the selfish and destructive policy of England." History teaches us that England is and always has been the most selfish nation in the world. She has ruined the material prosperity of every country with which she has an unrestricted commerce. Her statesmen, after the close of the war of 1812, urged her manufacturers to throw their goods upon our market at prices below cost in order to destroy our domestic industries, under the idea that when American competition was destroyed English manufacturers could demand their own prices and thus more than make up all losses sustained by underselling and destroying our industries. English statesmen, if I remember history correctly, advocated the subsidizing the English manufacturers by the government to enable them to undersell in our markets our manufacturers, and thus destroy them.

Mr. SPRINGER. If this tariff is so good, why do you want to revise it?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I say it needs revision because it is unequal in many particulars. It was made twenty years ago, and since then there have been changes in prices and cost of production. There are some articles on the free list that ought to pay duties, and some articles that now pay duties which ought to be put on the free list. I have not and do not defend the present tariff. This you would have seen had you given attention to what I have said. As you increase the supply by stimulating production you lower prices and give cheaper goods.

Gentlemen may appeal to books and the science of political economy and may produce a thousand speculative theories, but the fact will still remain undisturbed that prices are not governed by the duties laid upon the foreign article, but by the cost of production and supply and demand in this country. I appeal for its vindication to the history of the tariff and to the common observation of all practical men. I ask the farmers of the country if they do not purchase farming implements and all other manufactured goods that they consume much cheaper now than in 1860. Why are they so much cheaper?

The answer is that a tariff which has given adequate protection to American industries and American labor has stimulated American inventive genius and American industries until American manufacturers by the aid of improved machinery are able to supply goods far below the prices of 1860. "I plant myself," said Henry Clay, "upon this fact of cheapness and superiority as impregnable ground."

I may not be able to answer the theories and arguments of those who have studied this question from the writings of English statesmen and the science of political economy, but, like the blind man of the Gospel who had been restored to his sight by the Great Physician, who, not being able to answer the questions propounded to him by the scientist of Judea as to how he was healed, exclaimed, "There is one thing I do know, that whereas I was blind, now I see." Thus I answer these learned theorists and college professors that while I may not be able to tell how it is that a tariff has proven a blessing to our people and country when I open my eyes I see everywhere a thousand incontrovertible evidences of it. At my own home, in the beautiful hills and salubrious climate of North Alabama, may be seen evidences as strong as Holy Writ of the great benefits to our people of all classes which have flown from our protective system, evidences which of themselves overthrow and destroy all your learned theories and all your modern schools of political economy upon this subject.

But I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that so long as our Government has to raise a revenue of $200,000,000 by customs duties a tariff for revenue properly adjusted will give ample protection to all our industries, and no reasonable man would ask more.

While a few gentlemen who have addressed the committee on this question seem to deplore that the framers of the Constitution did not have the wisdom or patriotism to proclaim a universal brotherhood of nations and an unrestricted commerce with all the world, none has been so bold as to advocate the burning of our custom-houses and a resort to direct taxation, unless it be the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MCKENZIE.] This gentleman, for whom I have the highest respect, in answer to a question as to whether or not he was in favor of a resort to direct taxation in order to raise the revenues of the Government, answered:

> That is inhibited by the Constitution, except according to population, which is unjust and unequal; but when we get in power in this House, as we will do in the next election, I shall favor the introduction of measures of reform just as radical as that.

This language, when taken in connection with what immediately preceded it, very clearly to my mind commits my friend from Kentucky in favor of a constitutional amendment which would authorize Congress to raise the revenues for the support of the Government by a direct tax upon the property of the people of the States from a valuation fixed by Federal authority. This view is strengthened by the eloquent remarks which fell from the lips of Henry Watterson a few weeks ago at the Iroquois Club at Chicago, at the anniversary of the birth of Andrew Jackson. Hear him:

> The Democrat who is not a free-trader should go elsewhere. He should join the Republicans. The Democratic party will make a free-trade fight in 1884. * * * We spit upon compromises, and propose to neither ask nor give quarter.

These are strong and bold words, and fully support the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCKENZIE] for sending swarms of tax-assessors and collectors into every county in the States to assess and collect Federal taxes upon the same property and in the same manner that the States now assess and collect State taxes.

I admire the frankness of the gentleman from Kentucky, for he boldly proclaims that he at least is ready to revolutionize the revenue system of the fathers of Democracy, and to substitute in lieu thereof that system which they repudiated in the Federal convention which framed the Constitution.

The proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, if carried into execution, would authorize Federal tax-gatherers "to go into your houses, your kitchens, your cellars, and examine into your private concerns." It would authorize a Federal tax-assessor to examine the books of your merchants and shop-keepers. It would enable him to put his own valuation upon your property for taxable purposes.

The construction of the laws imposing the taxes upon your people and directing the collection of them, and questions arising thereon, together with the conduct of the officers and collectors who will be appointed to execute the law, as well as the conduct of the citizens of the States in reference thereto, will be conferred upon the Federal courts. Innocent citizens will be arrested upon trumped-up charges and dragged a hundred and fifty and in many cases two hundred and fifty miles from home and friends for no other purpose than to fill the pockets of marshals and deputies with fees and mileage. There would be continual conflicts of jurisdiction between the State and Federal collectors; the tax being assessed upon the same property would necessarily bring the two in conflict with each other.

The Federal Government could cripple or even destroy the States by taking from them all revenues for their support. The power to go into the States and to tax the property from which the States derive their revenues is unquestionably a power to destroy them. The Republican party has never given State rights so hard a blow as would the policy of the gentleman from Kentucky if adopted. The framers of the Federal Constitution preserved the State governments "as the most competent administrators of their local and domestic affairs," while they committed to the General Government certain specific and definite powers for the common defense and general welfare of all. And in order to guard this dual government and to prevent conflicts of jurisdiction as far as possible the General Government was granted exclusive power to collect revenue from customs duties, the States having retained the power to collect their revenue from property located within their respective jurisdictions.

The power was also granted the General Government to lay and collect excises; but it is clear from the debates in the conventions of the States which ratified the Constitution that it was never intended that a resort should ever be made by the General Government, either to excises or direct taxation, except in extraordinary emergencies. It was intended by the framers of the Constitution that the General Government should raise its revenue from customs duties in order to prevent conflict of jurisdictions between the States and Federal Government, as well as to give the States means for the support of their respective State governments.

This tax would fall mostly upon real estate. Experience has taught us that personal property generally escapes taxation in the States. There is no probability that the General Government would be more successful in reaching it than the States have been. The great moneyed interests, which are invested in stocks and bonds, would bear but little if any part of this tax. The gentlemen who claim to be the peculiar friends and guardians of the agricultural interests propose a system of taxation which would fall heavily and unequally upon the farmers, who own the greater portion of the real estate of the country.

But this is not all. Suppose the system of taxation proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky and his free-trade allies should be adopted; what will then take place? A tax will be laid upon all real estate limited only by the wants of the Government and the will of Congress. The crops from some cause may fail, as they frequently have, in the South; a Federal tax falls due; the farmers may have no means to pay this tax; the tax-gatherer comes around and demands the tax; it is not paid; the land is sold for its payment; some Vanderbilt or Gould purchases it; and thus one little humble home after another from time time will be sold for Federal taxes and purchased by some landed ring, till the greater portion of the agricultural lands of the South especially will have passed into the hands of a few hundred wealthy men.

The original owners will be forced to become tenants, and the purchasers landlords and landed aristocrats. Then hard times may overtake these poor tenants, and they may be unable to pay their rents; then an effort may be made by the landlords to evict them; then will be formed as in Ireland a land league; then a force act may follow; and then—I shall not attempt to prophesy what will follow.

Let the farmers of this country think of this picture of free trade and direct taxation. The men or set of men who should be instrumental in carrying such a measure into execution, however honest and patriotic they may be, and however pure may be their motives, would be appalled at the dire consequences, and they would assuredly receive the bitter curses of a ruined and miserable people.

If gentlemen desire to create a great landed aristocracy in the South; if they desire to see the South converted into an Ireland, let them go on with free trade and direct taxation and they will most assuredly realize, in the course of time, their desire.

The people of the South could not pay their proportion of the $200,000,000 of revenue now raised from customs duties in addition to the State, county, and municipal taxes. It would inevitably impoverish the people, and, in my opinion, would kindle a civil war more horrible and devastating than the late civil strife.

I tell the gentleman from Kentucky that if the Democratic party in an evil and unguarded hour should be persuaded by the eloquence of my friend from Kentucky, and other advocates of a universal brotherhood of nations and an unrestricted commerce, to adopt the policy foreshadowed by him in his very able and humorous speech delivered in this House a few days ago, that it would be the greatest error ever committed by any party in this country, and it would sound the death-knell of the best and grandest party that has ever controlled and governed a nation of freemen, and with its downfall I fear the last hope of local State governments would expire. Thousands of citizens who are devoted to the Democratic party, and who are proud of its pre-eminent achievements and its imperishable history, when it shall have so far departed from the paths trod by its fathers as to adopt the policy of the gentleman from Kentucky, believing as they would that its adoption would bring wide-spread disaster and ruin upon the American people, and especially upon the people of the South, as destructive as war, famine, or pestilence, would be impelled with sad and bleeding hearts to abandon its cause. Not that they loved their party less, but that they loved their country more.

But, Mr. Chairman, the Democratic party will never adopt free trade, nor the policy of sending swarms of Federal tax-gathers into the States to harass and worry the people. Free-traders will have to seek some other party if they expect an adoption of their heresy. They will have to form an alliance with the Mahoneites or some other political faction. No true Jeffersonian or Jacksonian Democrat can be a free-trader so long as your Government has to raise $250,000,000 of revenue. The Democratic party is not going to commit suicide by making a free-trade fight in 1884.

The true Democracy does not spit upon compromises. The Federal Constitution, the grandest work of the human mind, is a monument to the wisdom of the spirit of compromise. The late fraternal strife, with all its horrors and sufferings and loss of blood and life, could have been avoided and the Union saved if the party in power had not spit upon an honorable compromise offered by the Unionists of the South and sanctioned by the national Democratic party. The true Democracy will not wantonly drive any good and patriotic Democrat from its folds by any novel dogmas of a radical departure from the teachings and traditions of the party.

The lessons taught by the Charleston convention of 1860 are not yet forgotten by the true Democrats of this country. The patriotic men of the party will not permit the free-traders to play the part in 1884 that W. L. Yancey and his followers played at Charleston in 1860. The folly of Yancey and others at Charleston in 1860 cannot be repeated in 1884 by those who hold to the heresy of free trade. The men who make war upon the business interests of the country cannot be permitted to take control of the great Democratic party. Those who desire to see constitutional government restored, the liberties of the people secured, and the material prosperity of the country promoted should counsel harmony in the ranks of the Democratic party, and should not seek to force issues upon the party which are not democratic, and which one-half of the party cannot and will not support. The Democratic party can be united on a platform which declares for "equal and exact justice to all men;" "the support of the State governments in all their rights as the most competent administrators of our local and domestic affairs, and the surest bulwark against anti-republican tendencies;" "the preservation of the Federal Government in its whole constitutional vigor as the sheet-anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad;" "fair elections and an honest count;" "economy in the public expenditures that labor may be lightly burdened;" an honest payment of the public debt and a sacred preservation of the public faith; a tariff for revenue, discriminating in its arrangement and adjustment so as to give adequate protection to American labor and industries, but avoiding monopolies, or of giving to one industry an unjust advantage over another, and equalizing as far as possible the public burdens; public officers held to a rigid accountability; a mild and safe correction of the abuses which have crept into the legislation and administration of the Government for the last fifteen years; a repeal of all internal taxation; a sound and honest currency. Upon such a platform all good Democrats and conservative citizens could unite. With such a platform the Democracy would harmonize and would march shoulder to shoulder and hand in hand against the Republican party in 1884 to a grand and glorious victory, which would secure to the country an honest administration of public affairs.

Mr. Chairman, I favor a repeal of all internal taxation. There is no longer any necessity for this odious war tax. It serves as a constant reminder of the unhappy fraternal strife. It employs an army of officers and spies and involves millions of dollars as expenses in its collection. It clogs the courts of justice with prosecutions and fills our prisons with its victims. It has caused in many portions of my district wide-spread distress and suffering. The law is odious to our people and its execution in the Federal courts in Alabama has been disgraceful and tyrannical.

The down-trodden and oppressed people of Ireland have no greater cause for complaint against England than the citizens of Winston, Walker, Marion, and Fayette Counties in my district have against this Government for the oppressive and tyrannical manner in which this law has been executed in those counties. The law imposes unnecessarily heavy burdens upon the people. To wring from the hard earnings of the people $150,000,000 in excess of the wants of the Government is a monstrous wrong. A repeal of internal taxation will necessitate a revision of the tariff upon a revenue basis. Every dollar raised by this tax which may be necessary for the support of the Government can be replaced by a reduction of the tariff to a revenue basis, and thus the people can be relieved of the burdens of internal taxation, and such relief cause a reduction of the tariff. I have said all I desire to say at this time on this question.

I have shown that this bill does not confer any legislative functions upon the commission. I have shown that it violates no provision of the Constitution. I have shown that it is not a measure of delay but of expedition. I have shown that a tariff for protection is not unconstitutional. I have shown that Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and Jackson all advocated a tariff for protection. I have shown that a tariff for revenue only means an adjustment of the duties on imports so as to discriminate against American labor and industries. I have shown that a revenue tariff properly discriminating in favor of American industries will give adequate and ample protection. I have shown that all internal taxation ought to be repealed. I have shown that an adoption of the policy of free trade and direct taxation would destroy the State governments and impoverish the people.

I vote for this measure, Mr. Chairman, because I am earnestly in favor of an early revision of the tariff, and because I believe by the passage of this bill we will expedite that revision. Mr. Chairman, I have presented the views, sentiments, and aspirations of the South, regenerated by a baptism of blood and refined by the tribulations and sufferings of a mighty and terrible war. This new South, while making no apologies for the past, joins the great North in maintaining the national faith and sustaining and building up the material interests of the whole Union. This new, living, progressive South, forgetting the miserable past and burying in oblivion forever all sectional prejudices and animosities, joins the great North in hand and heart and moves forward shoulder to shoulder with her on the march to future greatness and glory.

MONTPELIER, September 18, 1828.

DEAR SIR: Your late letter reminds me of our conversation on the constitutionality of the power in Congress to impose a tariff for the encouragement of manufactures, and of my promise to sketch the grounds of the confident opinion I had expressed that it was among the powers vested in that body.

The Constitution vests in Congress expressly "the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," and "the power to regulate trade."

That the former power, if not particularly expressed, would have been included in the latter as one of the objects of a general power to regulate trade, is not necessarily impugned by its being so expressed. Examples of this sort cannot sometimes be easily avoided, and are to be seen elsewhere in the Constitution. Thus the power to "define and punish offenses against the law of nations" includes the power, afterward particularly expressed, "to make rules concerning captures, &c., from offending neutrals." So also a power "to coin money" would doubtless include that of "regulating its value," had not the latter power been expressly inserted.

The term taxes, if standing alone, would certainly have included duties, imposts, and excises. In another clause it is said, "no tax or duties shall be laid on exports," &c. Here the two terms are used as synonymous; and in another clause, where it is said, "no State shall lay any impost or duties," &c., the terms imposts and duties are synonymous. Pleonasms, tautologies, and the promiscuous use of terms and phrases, differing in their shades of meaning, (always to be expounded with reference to the contract, and under the control of the general character and manifest scope of the instrument in which they are found,) are to be ascribed sometimes to the purpose of greater caution, sometimes to the imperfections of language, and sometimes to the imperfections of man himself. In this view of the subject it was quite natural, however certainly the general power to regulate trade might include a power to impose duties on it, not to omit it in a clause enumerating the several modes of revenue authorized by the Constitution.

In few cases could the "ex majori cautela" occur with more claim to respect. Nor can it be inferred that a power to regulate trade does not involve a power to tax it, from the distinction made in the original controversy with Great Britain between a power to regulate trade with the colonies and a power to tax them. A power to regulate trade between different parts of the empire was confessedly necessary; and was admitted to lie, as far as that was the case, in the British Parliament; the taxing part being at the same time denied to the Parliament and asserted to be necessarily inherent in the colonial legislatures, as sufficient, and the only safe depositories of the taxing power. So difficult was it, nevertheless, to maintain the distinction in practice that the ingredient of revenue was occasionally overlooked or disregarded in the British regulations, as in the duty on sugar and molasses imported into the colonies. And it was fortunate that the attempt at an internal and direct tax in the case of the stamp act produced a radical examination of the subject before a regulation of trade with a view to revenue had grown into an established authority.

One thing at least is certain, that the main and admitted object of the parliamentary regulations of trade with the colonies was the encouragement of manufactures in Great Britain. But the present question is unconnected with the former relations between Great Britain and her colonies, which were of a peculiar, a complicated, and, in several respects, of an undefined character. It is a simple question under the Constitution of the United States whether "the power to regulate trade with foreign nations" as a distinct and substantive item in the enumerated powers embraces the object of encouraging by duties, restrictions, and prohibitions the manufactures and products of the country? And the affirmative must be inferred from the following considerations:

1. The meaning of the phrase "to regulate trade," must be sought in the general use of it; in other words, in the objects to which the power was generally understood to be applicable when the phrase was inserted in the Constitution.

2. The power has been understood and used by all commercial and manufacturing nations as embracing the object of encouraging manufactures. It is believed that not a single exception can be named.

3. This has been particularly the case with Great Britain, whose commercial vocabulary is the parent of our own. A primary object of her commercial regulations is well known to have been the protection and encouragement of her manufactures.

4. Such was understood to be a proper use of the power by the States most prepared for manufacturing industry, while retaining the power over their foreign trade.

Such a use of the power by Congress accords with the intention and expectation of the States, in transferring the power over trade from themselves to the Government of the United States. That was emphatically the case in the Eastern, the more manufacturing members of the confederacy. Hear the language held in the convention of Massachusetts:

By Mr. DAWES, an advocate for the Constitution, it was observed: "Our manufactures are another great subject which has received no encouragement by national duties on foreign manufactures, and they never can by any authority in the old confederation."

Again: "If we wish to encourage our own manufactures, to preserve our own commerce, to raise the value of our own lands, we must give Congress the power in question."

By Mr. Widgery, an opponent: "All we hear is that the merchant and farmer will flourish, and that the mechanic and tradesman are to make their fortunes directly if the Constitution goes down."

The convention of Massachusetts was the only one in New England whose debates have been preserved, except a portion of the convention of Connecticut. But it cannot be doubted that the sentiment there expressed was common to the other States in that quarter, more especially to Connecticut and Rhode Island, the most thickly peopled of all the States, and having, of course, their thoughts most turned to the subject of manufactures. A like inference may be confidently applied to New Jersey, whose debates in convention have not been preserved. In the populous and manufacturing State of Pennsylvania, a partial account only of the debate having been published, nothing certain is known of what passed in her convention on this point. But ample evidence may be found elsewhere, that regulations of trade for the encouragement of manufactures were considered as within the power to be granted to the new Congress, as well as within the scope of the national policy. Of the States south of Pennsylvania, the only two in whose conventions the debates have been preserved are Virginia and North Carolina, and from these no adverse inferences can be drawn. Nor is there the slightest indication that either of the two States farthest south, whose debates in convention, if preserved, have not been made public, viewed the encouragement of manufactures as not within the general power over trade to be transferred to the Government of the United States.

If Congress has not the power it is annihilated for the nation; a policy without example in any other nation, and not within the reason of the solitary one in our own. The example alluded to is the prohibition of a tax on exports, which resulted from the apparent impossibility of raising in that mode a revenue from the States proportioned to the ability to pay it—the ability of some being derived in a great measure not from their exports but from their fisheries, from their freights, and from commerce at large; in some its branches altogether external to the United States, the profits from all which, being invisible and intangible, would escape a tax on exports. A tax on imports, on the other hand, being a tax on consumption, which is in proportion to the ability of the consumers, wheresoever derived, was free from that inequality.

If revenue be the sole object of a legitimate impost, and the encouragement of domestic articles be not within the power of regulating trade, it would follow that no monopolizing or unequal regulations of foreign nations could be counteracted; that neither the staple articles of subsistence nor the essential implements for the public safety could under any circumstances be insured or fostered at home by regulations of commerce, the usual and most convenient mode of providing for both; and that the American navigation, though the source of naval defense, of a cheapening competition in carrying our valuable and bulky articles to market, and of an independent carriage of them during foreign wars, when a foreign navigation might be withdrawn, must be at once abandoned or speedily destroyed; it being evident that a tonnage duty in foreign ports against our vessels and an exemption from such a duty in our ports in favor of foreign vessels, must have the inevitable effect of banishing ours from the ocean.

* * * * * * *

That the encouragement of manufactures was an object of the power to regulate trade is proved by the use made of the power for that object in the first session of the first Congress under the Constitution, when among the members present were so many who had been members of the Federal Convention which framed the Constitution and of the State conventions which ratified it, each of these classes consisting also of members who had opposed and who had espoused the Constitution in its actual form. It does not appear from the printed proceedings of Congress on that occasion that the power was denied by any of them. And it may be remarked that members from Virginia in particular, as well of the anti-Federal as the Federal party, the names then distinguishing those who had opposed and those who had approved the Constitution, did not hesitate to propose duties and to suggest even prohibitions in favor of several articles of her productions. By one a duty was proposed on mineral coal in favor of the Virginia coal pits; by another a duty on hemp was proposed to encourage the growth of that article; and by a third a prohibition even of foreign beef was suggested as a measure of sound policy.

A further evidence in support of the constitutional power to protect and foster manufactures by regulations of trade, an evidence that ought of itself to settle the question, is the uniform and practical sanction given to the power by the General Government for nearly forty years, with a concurrence or acquiescence of every State government throughout the same period, and, it may be added, through all the vicissitudes of party which marked the period. No novel construction, however ingeniously devised, or however reputable or patriotic its patrons, can withstand the weight of such authorities or the unbroken current of so prolonged and universal a practice. And well it is that this cannot be done without the intervention of the same authority which made the Constitution. If it could be so done, there would be an end to that stability in government and in laws which is essential to good government and good laws, a stability the want of which is the imputation which has at all times been leveled against republicanism with most effect by its most dexterous adversaries.

The imputation ought never, therefore, to be countenanced by innovating constructions without any plea of a precipitancy or a paucity of the constructive precedents they oppose; without any appeal to material facts newly brought to light; without any claim to a better knowledge of the original evils and inconveniences for which remedies were needed, the very best keys to the true object and meaning of all laws and constitutions.

And may it not be left to the unbiased judgment of all men of experience and intelligence to decide which is most to be relied on for a sound and safe test of the meaning of the Constitution, a uniform interpretation by all the successive authorities under it, commencing with its birth and continuing for a long period through the varied state of political contests or the opinion of every new Legislature, heated as it may be by the strife of parties, or warped, as often happens, by the eager pursuit of some favorite object, or carried away, possibly, by the powerful eloquence or captivating addresses of a few popular statesmen, themselves perhaps influenced by the same misleading causes? If the latter test is to prevail, every new legislative opinion might make a new constitution, as the foot of every new chancellor would make a new standard of measure.

Mr. SPRINGER obtained the floor.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] will yield, I will move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will yield for that motion, retaining my right to the floor.

There was no objection, and the bill, with the Senate amendments, was taken from the Speaker's table.

MILEAGE OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred a motion to print certain papers transmitted to the Senate by the Secretary of War in pursuance of a resolution of the Senate of February 28, to report it adversely. I think it is proper, in justice to the Secretary of War, to read the resolution under which the papers were transmitted to the Senate. It is as follows:

> Whereas the Secretary of War has officially advised Congress in the estimates for deficiencies that the $200,000 appropriated for "mileage to officers of the Army" for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, "will be exhausted before the end of February," and that "much inconvenience may be caused by the inability of the (this) Department to reimburse officers for expenses incurred while traveling under orders after that date," and asks an appropriation of $52,000 to meet the deficiency: Therefore,
> Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate as soon as practicable an itemized statement of how, by whom, and under what exigency or orders the $200,000 aforesaid has been expended in eight months, and whether the estimate of $52,000 will be sufficient for the remaining four months, stating his reasons for assuming that $52,000 will suffice to complete the service for the fiscal year.

It will be noticed that this resolution calls for "an itemized statement of how, by whom, and under what exigency or orders" the amount named was expended. The Secretary of War has furnished a tabulated statement of how, by whom, under what authority, and the amount paid; and he has transmitted herewith copies of the orders. This the Secretary of War was directed to do by the Senate. He has done this, no more. He could do no less. It was not for him to decide whether the information called for was necessary or expedient; it was his duty to obey the direction of the Senate. This he has done. If he had replied to the resolution of the Senate that the information was unnecessary, expensive, cumbrous, and voluminous, it would be difficult for me to dispute his assertion, but he certainly would have incurred the censure of the Senate.

This reminds me of the frequency with which we call upon the Departments for information without being fully advised of the cost of furnishing that information and the value of it when obtained. I had the honor at one time to introduce a proposed rule of the Senate requiring that all such resolutions should be referred to the appropriate committees, but it did not meet with the favor of the Senate.

The Secretary of War is fully exonerated in sending these documents, and he would have been to blame if he had not done it.

Mr. BECK. Do I understand that the committee decline to have anything printed?

Mr. ANTHONY. They recommend not to print any of the papers.

Mr. BECK. Why?

Mr. ANTHONY. Because the papers furnish no information to the Senate. They were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and this is a long tabulated statement of how, by whom, under what authority, and the amount ordered for these expenditures. The papers are mere formal papers giving the copies of the orders. If the Senator desires to have them printed I certainly have no objection, though I think it would be a very useless expense, and it was a useless expense to have them prepared and sent here.

Mr. BECK. I do not want any useless papers printed. I have not examined the mass of papers sent to us; they were referred to the Committee on Printing for examination. Of course I have not had an opportunity to see them. I desire now to state, in answer to what was said by the Senator from Rhode Island about the useless expenditure involved in printing this report, that the Committee on Appropriations had allowed, according to my recollection, (I have sent for the exact data,) $200,000 to cover the mileage of Army officers traveling under orders for the current year. The chairman of the committee will perhaps correct me. Was that the amount allowed?

Mr. ALLISON. That was the amount.

Mr. BECK. That $200,000 was expended in eight months, according to the report of the Secretary of War. Now, either the Congress of the United States did not allow the Army a sufficient amount for mileage, or it was expended, in part at least, in ways that Congress did not intend that it should be.

Being a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and desiring to give to the Army just what was needed for the fiscal year for which we are now about to appropriate, I thought it was very important that we should know the exact facts in regard to this mileage matter. If the money was improperly expended it would become important for us to take care that proper checks and guards against wrongful expenditure should be made in regard to the appropriations for next year. If it should be made to appear that Congress had not allowed the Army what was necessary for the service then it would be important to know what the truth is, so that we could increase the amount up to what was actually necessary, and if an improper use had been made of past appropriations we should take care to guard against abuses hereafter.

That was the whole object I had in view in asking for the information called for in the resolution passed by the Senate. The Secretary of War, and indeed the General of the Army seem to think—as I received information to that effect from the General of the Army before he went West—that I was reflecting upon their action or upon them individually. Perhaps something I said at the time about how little the Departments cared for the acts of Congress may have induced those gentlemen to think that I did. I desire now to say here that nothing was further from my purpose than to reflect upon the Secretary of War. I did not know that he had even seen the bundle of papers sent to us. I supposed they were sent by somebody in the Department, and I did not desire or intend to make any reflection on the Secretary. I desired information to guide us in the future, so that the public interests might be intelligently and economically conducted in this as in all other regards; and I did not think such a pile of papers were necessary to give the desired information. I am satisfied that the answer of the Secretary was made in absolute good faith and in strict accordance with what he thought the resolution required. It was perhaps broader than I intended, as it was written at my desk, without much time for reflection.

I never have doubted that the present Secretary of War is doing the very best he can to manage his Department in the very best way he can. I have not only great confidence in him, but absolute faith in his integrity of purpose and in his desire to do right; but I know how men in official station are imposed upon; I know how the heads of bureaus run on, and perhaps never tell the head of the Department until the very last minute how they are spending money. I do not know that they have been doing wrong in this regard in the War Department, but I desired the information in order to ascertain to my own satisfaction at least whether they were or not.

If a reference of all the papers sent by the Secretary to the Committee on Appropriations without printing will enable the committee intelligently to understand what is best to do in the future and how to do it, that is all I want. I was not in the Senate when the papers were referred to the Committee on Printing, and I did not know what the object was in having them printed. I was not aware that they had been sent to the Committee on Appropriations at the same time, as I now understand they were. I am a member of that committee and I can obtain the information myself out of the papers. I have no doubt either I or the chairman can summon whoever has charge of that matter in the War Department before us to explain all the facts to the committee, and the committee can explain them to the Senate. Perhaps it is better to take that course, and not print them now.

As I said before, at some remarks which I made in which I happened to mention General Sherman he took some offense, perhaps properly. Indeed, I rather think he was right, because I find that I intimated that much of the money was spent in junketing, and the record shows that I said that perhaps was going off then in palace-cars at Government expense. I did not mean to intimate that I had any information that General Sherman did any such thing. I was seeking to illustrate by speaking of possibilities. On the contrary, I am bound to say, as I have said on the floor of the Senate before, that whenever I, as a member of the Appropriations Committee, saw any extravagance going on in Army matters, or anything improper about to be charged to the Army, no matter whether it was in relation to the building of bridges, the building or laying of telegraph lines, the building of extravagant barracks, or anything anywhere that appeared to be wrong, the first person that I always sent for was the General of the Army; and in nine cases out of ten he stops all jobs if he sees anything that he thinks is wrong or extravagant; he announces with great emphasis that it shall not be done with his consent, and the committee relies on him with great confidence. I have found him, so far from expending money unnecessarily, always endeavoring to stop more things that ought to be stopped than any other officer there is in the Army, and I rely upon him and his judgment and courage more than on anybody else.

I make these remarks only to show that I was not seeking to reflect upon him, even if I was unfortunate in the language used, but I do want to compel the Departments to obey Congress. If Congress does wrong I want all executive officers to come before us and tell us that they cannot get along with the appropriations we have made for them, stating the reasons why, and give us a chance, but I will never consent to allow them to go on and spend the appropriation intended or allowed for a year in eight months, when there are four months yet to run, as was done in this case. Make an absolute demand for more as a matter of right. Each Department and bureau of the Government ought to be made to depend upon us, and if we do wrong let us be held responsible to the country. I do not intend, if I can help it, to allow any of them to defy us. It was to make that issue and that alone that I endeavored to get this information. The Army behaves better generally in this regard than any other department, therefore I perhaps felt more like making a fuss than I would with habitual offenders who care nothing for what we do or say.

If the Committee on Appropriations can reach it, as it is to be referred to us, and we can thus save the cost and delay of printing even the tabulated statement, all well; I do not ask any more, as the Army bill is now before us. I see the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations on his feet. If he desires any part of the matter printed, or if the chairman of the Committee on Printing thinks any part of it ought to be printed, let it be done; if not, let the papers go to the Committee on Appropriations, and we will look into them ourselves and invite the Secretary of War or some of his officers to come before us and tell us briefly just how the matter stands. We can then take proper steps to guard against a repetition of wrongs or blunders, if any are found to exist.

I have believed that part of the mileage appropriation for this year was spent wrongly. I do not think, for example, that the Secretary of War or anybody else had any right, or that any officer of the Government, for I do not know who attends to this mileage business, had any right to send officers to Yorktown and spend $20,000 or $30,000 in that way for mileage. If they want to go to any grand parade or jubilee of that sort, let them go as I have to go, as the Senator from Rhode Island has to go, paying their own expenses; they will be glad to get a chance to go on these terms. When they are on legitimate Army duty I propose to let their mileage be paid, but I am afraid, and I believe, because I do not know any better, that a good deal of the mileage money was paid for mileage to Army gentlemen who were not detached from their places on business of the Government, but went for their own pleasure. If that is the case I intend to have something done, if I can, that will in the future prevent that sort of expenditure.

Mr. ALLISON. I have made some examination and investigation into this question of mileage, with a view to do justice in the Army appropriation bill now pending in the Committee on Appropriations. I think the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky has had a beneficial effect on the Army. The difficulty with reference to the question of mileage is that every commanding officer has an opportunity of ordering officers to perform specific duties, and when these duties are performed and travel is involved, of course they are paid mileage. The Paymaster-General kindly furnished me with a statement of the monthly cost of mileage during the present fiscal year so far as it has passed, or for nine months. It is a very careful table, showing the amount expended for mileage, and is as follows:

Amount of mileage expended.

Periods.	Months.	Amount.	Average per month.
From July 1, 1881, to November 30, 1881	5	$105,642 36	$21,128 47
From November 30, 1881, to January 31, 1882	2	34,068 68	17,034 34
From February 1, 1882, to February 28, 1882	1	14,596 96	14,596 96
From March 1, 1882, to March 31, 1882	1	15,704 36	15,704 36
	9	170,012 36	18,890 26

I find from this table that the total expenditure for mileage for the nine months ending March 31 has been $170,000.

Mr. BECK. The Secretary of War announced to us officially that the $200,000 appropriated would be exhausted by the 28th of February, at the end of eight months.

Mr. ALLISON. That statement, however, was based on the expenditures of the first five months.

Mr. BECK. That included Yorktown, I presume?

Mr. ALLISON. If the Yorktown celebration was within five months from the 1st of July, 1881, of course it included Yorktown. The average expenditure for the first five months was $21,000 a month, and for the first six months it was at the rate of $122,000 for the year. If that expenditure had continued during the whole year, the deficiency asked for by the Secretary of War, who made the request undoubtedly upon the information received from the Paymaster-General, would have been required; but the Paymaster-General informs me that the $20,000 already appropriated will most likely run through the entire fiscal year, so that no additional appropriation will be required. Upon inquiry he states to the sub-committee that the sum of $220,000, the amount appropriated this year, will be ample for next year's service.

Therefore, I think, while it is unnecessary perhaps to print any portion of this report, some good has resulted from the inquiry made by the Senator from Kentucky, and the result will be beneficial.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question in connection with that statement? Is the $170,000 in full for transportation of officers traveling with troops, or is it simply mileage for officers on detached service?

Mr. ALLISON. It includes only the mileage of officers on detached service. It is the sum expended under the appropriation of $200,000 for the current fiscal year, and the Paymaster-General says he is quite satisfied that the $20,000 which we appropriated in February will last for the remainder of the fiscal year. I think, on the whole, the Committee on Appropriations can secure the necessary information to enable them to act intelligently without printing the papers which we have now before us.

Mr. BECK. That is all I desire. The chairman seems to have more information than I had relative to the subject. I have no doubt that the Secretary of War himself will be very glad, if anything has been developed by looking into this matter, to do anything that will enable him in the future to put restrictions on practices which perhaps have been going on for years and may have grown into a custom which can be restrained hereafter. I do not know, but I believe from the official statement, $200,000 having been spent in eight months, that $100,000 apparently would be necessary in the remaining four months; but if they can manage to get along with the $20,000 additional until the beginning of the next fiscal year, we shall then be able to look into the matter and have some guide for the next appropriation.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to state what I think is the material thing about this whole question. Congress substantially said at the last session that $200,000 should be the entire amount used for the purpose of transporting officers in the discharge of the duties which might be specially devolved on them. The War Department disregarded that direction and made such expenditures that more than that amount of money became necessary. It is not a question as to whether $200,000 was enough or whether it was too little; it is a question as to whether the executive branch of the Government is to receive its direction from the legislative branch or otherwise.

I think myself that when Congress had fixed the amount at $200,000 it was the duty of the Secretary of War to inform his subordinates that the expenditures must come within that sum, and that they must so order the duties of their respective divisions or departments as that the amount to be expended would come within the appropriation.

It may be supposed that the $200,000 was to be the entire amount expended for Army transportation, but I call attention to the report of the Quartermaster-General for 1881, in which he shows that the amount expended for ordinary Army transportation was over $1,800,000. The appropriation of $200,000 was only to send individual officers from station to station in the performance of court-martial and other duties to which they might be assigned.

I think I state that which every Senator here knows when I say that a very considerable portion of this expenditure is absolutely unnecessary, that it is done for the convenience of officers, that they are ordered from station to station as a matter of convenience to themselves, and not as a matter of duty to the Government at all. There are to-day over one hundred officers of the Army on duty in Washington, ordered here for various purposes. While I do not say that there are very conspicuous violations of law involved in these orders, at the same time it is a fact well known and understood that favoritism in the Army will enable officers to obtain an order for transportation in certain cases when in other cases it cannot be had at all.

I say that whenever Congress has fixed $200,000 or any other sum as the gross appropriation which shall be applied for this purpose, it is the duty of the Secretary of War to bring himself within it, and it is not only his duty, but it is absolutely within his power to do it. It does not involve the transportation of troops necessary to put down Indian hostilities, it does not involve the transportation of troops from station to station, affecting in a larger way the efficiency of the Army, but it is largely a question of personal convenience of Army officers, and if the sum were fixed at $50,000 it would be perfectly easy for the Secretary of War to carry on the Army administration, give it all the efficiency it has to-day, and expend no more than the sum of $50,000.

I do not object to the amount, but I do object to the constant assumption of the Executive Departments of the Government of their right to expend far beyond the direction of the legislative branch, and say that notwithstanding we appropriated $200,000 they can expend all that in nine months of the year and then come to us and with a round turn say, "If you do not give us more of course the ordinary operations of the Army or of the Post-Office Department, or of the Navy Department, as the case may be, have got to be stopped." It is well enough to put down a peg first as well as last, and say that when after mature deliberation Congress has said a certain amount is necessary only that amount shall be expended, and some one of the officers of the Executive Departments of the Government charged with the expenditure of the money shall at least feel himself under a responsibility to limit the expenditure within the amount thus prescribed.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I have not heard all of the debate, but I wish to make a remark or two, with the indulgence of the Senate. In the first place, I think the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is entirely right in his desire to know why the Army has gone beyond the $200,000 set apart for mileage.

This debate runs upon the purely incidental question as to whether it is worth while to print this large mass of papers sent here in answer to the Senator's resolution. The papers are rightly sent here, because he called for an itemized account. The Secretary of War was obliged to obey literally, of course, and faithfully, and he has done so. The itemized account, it so happens, really does not give the Senator the information he desires. That can be obtained, however, and far better, from a few hours' conversation with the Secretary of War and three or four of the leading staff officers, because they know why they have been obliged to give more orders or permits for mileage than usual.

As I say, this does not give him the information. Here are some fifty pages of what the printers call costly rule and figure work, which if set up would probably make one hundred or one hundred and fifty pages in a book, which would not be worth one farthing for the purposes of inquiry. For example, here is the first line, and the others are all like it: Captain John Putnam, paid by C. J. Sprague $28, under special order No. 36, Watertown arsenal; Major George W. McKee, paid by Sprague $45.12, under special order No. 271, headquarters of the Army. I read at random. Captain Henry O. Perley, paid by Paymaster Sprague, under special order No. 274, headquarters of the Army, $61.28. Those are separate lines in this report, and if you desire to know why the officer was sent or what duty he was sent upon under that special order, here are the whole of the special orders in this large package before me.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is not one-quarter of them.

Mr. HAWLEY. No, it is not one-quarter of them; I beg pardon, here are the others. How do they read? Here is one of them:

Captain E. B. Kirk, assistant quartermaster United States Army, will proceed without delay to Saint Louis, Missouri, on public business connected with the repair and payment of the crew of the United States steamer General Sherman. On the completion of this duty Captain Kirk will return to his station.

Again, dated "Headquarters Department of Dakota, Fort Snelling, Minnesota," is an order directing Major Alexander Sharp, of the Pay Department, to proceed to pay the troops stationed at Forts Randall, Hale, Sully, and Bennett, Dakota Territory. Here is an order directing "First Lieutenant John Carland, Sixth Infantry, having reported to the Adjutant-General of the Army in compliance with orders No. 114, July 13, 1881, camp on White River, Colorado," to return to his station, camp on White River, Colorado. So you read through by the week a dreary mass of detail sending officers back and forth on their stations, and it would not appear once out of a hundred times that there was any special favor to any officer in it, as suggested by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.] I beg to say that I think he was quite unjust in that. It may, of course, sometimes happen that in administering the affairs of the Army an officer will be ordered to some place on a particular duty because he has a wife or a mother or a sweetheart there and he would like to go on that particular duty, and they manage to combine pleasure and family duty with the orders of the Army. That, of course, sometimes happens; and it may happen, and I do not say that it does not once in a while, that some very pleasant inspecting duty is invented for the purpose of gratifying some officers who desire to go over some of these posts. Here is an order which directs an officer to inspect a large number of posts. I have no doubt it was necessary in the general management and government of the Army.

I therefore simply protest that the Senator from Kansas is liable to do injustice by his rather sweeping declaration that a large part of this is done simply to please certain officers, and I do not think that his $50,000 would approach the necessities of the service. He is quite unjust in suggesting that amount, for having a small Army and having it scattered over at least 3,000 miles in width and 2,000 or more miles in breadth, it is absolutely necessary to incur a very considerable expenditure in the way of mileage and transportation.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me ask the Senator who is the judge of that necessity?

Mr. HAWLEY. The War Department is to a large extent the judge of it, but it cannot always govern it.

Mr. ALLISON. It is done under the commanding officers.

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly, under the general laws and regulations of the Army. General Hancock is responsible for a considerable portion of the expenditures, as well as General Terry, in Minnesota, and whoever happens just now to be commanding at San Francisco; I have forgotten who it is.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. General McDowell.

Mr. HAWLEY. In short, the chiefs of the several departments, the Quartermaster-General and Surgeon-General, and all the officers charged with subdivisions here, have authority to send an officer, and of course they must have authority to send an officer on special duty.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Senator, ought that authority to properly exist with them instead of the Congressional authority, which makes the appropriation?

Mr. HAWLEY. I think as a general thing Army officers consider these appropriations as an absolute order; and here comes in the only suggestion I will trouble the Senate with: that looking in advance, looking over the necessities and duties of the twelve months, it is quite impossible to lay the figure down with absolute certainty. The pay of the Army you can get very nearly right in your appropriation act, because you count your roll, and you know your aggregate will not vary two hundred in the course of the year. You can get very nearly right on that, and so with the food and clothing of the Army; but in appropriating for all this detailed work it is impossible to make an accurate estimate, and if the War Department officers begin to perform their duties faithfully, it will sometimes happen at the close of six, seven, or eight months that, to their surprise and I venture to say always to their regret, they are running up to their appropriation, and they will have to stop at the end of ten months unless they get a little more extra money.

Mr. PLUMB. The only comment I have to make on what the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] has said is that it is quite competent for the Secretary of War and his subordinates to say that Congress having adopted a certain amount as the maximum, they shall bring their expenditures within that sum and leave the responsibility with Congress. I may say that a little less family duty and a little more military duty within the ordinary purview of these orders is something I think which would result just as well as the present system. I said $50,000 would do; and I say now that the ordering of officers from post to post and from various posts to Washington has become an abuse. No one can say that there is duty today for one hundred officers in Washington, as there are here now. There is no such necessity; there never did exist any such necessity for that work. This thing of giving to some one person who may have a family here or a family there, a sweetheart here or a sweetheart there, an order because he wants to go, and which does not cost anything to the person who puts his name to the order, is something which has gone beyond the limits of ordinary patience, and when that exceeds the legislative authority named in the appropriation act giving it it becomes something which ought to be the subject of Congressional investigation.

Mr. ANTHONY. I thought the debate upon the reference of this question to the Committee on Printing attributed some blame to the Secretary of War and that it was right in his vindication that the resolution should be read to show that he had done all the Senate directed him to do, and nothing more. The remarks of the Senator from Kentucky, in exoneration of the Secretary are precisely what I should expect from the frankness and the manliness of his character.

I said that these papers had been referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The motion to refer to the Committee on Appropriations was reconsidered and the papers were referred to the Committee on Printing. I will therefore ask that the Committee on Printing be discharged from their further consideration and that they be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. If the Committee on Appropriations desires anything printed they can ask for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Printing will be discharged from the further consideration of the subject and the papers will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 5804) to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 432) to amend section 1190 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to paymasters' clerks of the United States Army, reported it with an amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRISON. I am also instructed by the same committee, to whom were referred two bills which relate to the same subject, to report them adversely, and to ask that they be indefinitely postponed, as the subject is covered by the bill just reported.

The bill (S. No. 588) regulating the employment of civilian clerks for disbursing officers of the Army, and the bill (S. No. 457) to amend section 1190 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to paymasters' clerks of the United States Army, were postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 846) for the relief of A. G. Peabody, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1638) for the relief of the heirs of Major D. C. Smith, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 783) for the relief of Francis Gilbeau, reported it with amendments; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 907) for the relief of John Fletcher, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1800) for the relief of Mary A. Lee, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1706) for the relief of George H. Carlyle, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 708) for the relief of Mrs. Ellen Call Long and Mrs. Mary K. Brevard, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

THE SOLDIERS' HOME INVESTIGATION.

Mr. SEWELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to submit the testimony taken in the investigation ordered by the Senate into the Soldiers' Home at Washington, and also to submit a report on the same.

The report, with the testimony, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONGER. May I ask if the report includes the testimony?

Mr. SEWELL. The report includes all the testimony.

I offer the following resolution for the printing of extra copies of the report alone:

Resolved, That 1,500 copies of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs on the Soldiers' Home in addition to the usual number of copies be printed for the use of the Senate, independent of the testimony relating thereto.

Mr. COCKRELL. The resolution only covers the report itself. Let the report and testimony be printed—the usual number—and then the resolution will cover simply the report.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SEWELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report an original bill on this subject.

The bill (S. No. 1821) prescribing regulations for the Soldiers' Home located at Washington, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

MIAMI INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. INGALLS. Senate bill No. 328, to provide for the sale of the lands of the Miami Indians in Kansas, passed the House of Representatives with an amendment, which was yesterday referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. That committee, after consideration, direct me to report it back to the Senate with a recommendation that the amendment be concurred in. I ask that it may be read.

The Acting Secretary read the amendment of the House of Representatives, which was to add to the bill the following:

SEC. 4. That the provisions of this act shall not in any way affect the rights or claims of those individual Miamis or persons of Miami blood or descent who are named in the corrected list referred to in the amendment of the Senate to the fourth article of the treaty of June 5, 1854, or their descendants; and before the proceeds which have been or may be hereafter realized from the sale of said lands shall be applied for any purpose or distributed, the Secretary of the Interior shall obtain the opinion of the Attorney-General as to what rights or interests, if any, the said persons have or had in and to said lands; and if in his opinion they are or were entitled to have parcels of said land allotted to them under the provisions of said treaty, and failed to receive the same, then the said Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay to each of said persons out of the proceeds of the sale of said lands as aforesaid a sum equal to the value of two hundred acres of said land as appraised for the purpose of making said sale, for and in lieu of their interest in said lands, and that of the surplus of said proceeds which may then remain, if any, that they receive their pro rata share thereof the same as other members of said late tribe of Miami Indians.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment made by the House of Representatives.

Mr. PLUMB. I hope my colleague will explain the effect of that amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. It relates to an existing unsettled controversy between members of the Miami tribe of Indians. The amendment does not propose to settle that controversy, but leaves the Secretary of the Interior and the Attorney-General to take cognizance of the matter hereafter; and in case it shall be decided that the claimants have any rights it declares in what manner the proceeds of the land shall be distributed.

Mr. PLUMB. It is a controversy between that branch of the tribe remaining in Indiana and that in Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand that to be the fragment of the tribe that is intended to be benefited by the amendment of the House.

The amendment was concurred in.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HALE asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1822) granting an increase of pension to George E. Wilder; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SEWELL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1823) for the protection of fisheries on the Atlantic coast; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PUGH (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1824) to provide for the settlement of an account with the Vicksburgh and Meridian Railroad Company for internal-revenue tax, and to refund the amount of said tax erroneously assessed and collected; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HARRISON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1825) making appropriation for the purpose of constructing a road from the city of New Albany, in the State of Indiana, to the national cemetery near said city; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THOMAS PILGRIM.

Mr. COKE. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Acting Secretary of the Senate be, and is hereby, instructed to pay to Mrs. A. L. McIntyre, of New Jersey, out of the funds for contingent expenses of the Senate, the sum of $84, in trust for the infant child of Thomas Pilgrim, deceased, said sum being the balance due said Pilgrim as late clerk of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The resolution states the fact that that sum is due to Thomas Pilgrim, late clerk of the Committee on Indian Affairs, who died recently, leaving an infant child, the only member of his family, who has been left in charge of Mrs. McIntyre. The resolution simply authorizes the Acting Secretary of the Senate to pay the amount due.

Mr. INGALLS. Has the matter been referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses?

Mr. COKE. It is a small amount. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. It is customary—and I think the precedent is a valuable one—that resolutions appropriating money out of the contingent fund should be referred to the committee on that subject for inquiry and in order to avoid difficulty that might arise. I am very sure the committee will report it promptly to-morrow. I suggest that the resolution take that course.

Mr. COKE. I am satisfied.

The resolution was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

ORIGINAL PORTRAITS OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of purchasing 5,000 copies of the work entitled Original Portraits of Washington, by Elizabeth Bryant Johnson, for distribution to the public libraries throughout the United States.

ALLEGATIONS OF IMPROPER INFLUENCE.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair, whose duty it shall be to investigate and ascertain whether any corrupt or improper influences have been brought to bear on any member of this body in regard to House bill No. 5656, now pending before the Senate Finance Committee, being a bill to amend certain laws on the subject of distilled spirits in special bonded warehouses; and said committee shall also inquire whether any attempt of any kind has been made to bring such improper or corrupt influences to bear on any member of this body in order to secure the passage or the defeat of said bill; and said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and shall report the result of such investigation at as early a day as possible.

I do not care to say a word at this time further than that I think this a very proper resolution, in view of certain publications which have been made, and I think it is the proper way to meet them.

I hope the Senate will adopt the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is unanimous consent given to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MORRILL. I know nothing about this subject. This is the first intimation I have heard that there was any necessity for any such investigation. I hardly think there is now, unless the Senator knows of some fact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MORRILL. I merely ask the Senator from Indiana if he knows of any fact himself that would justify an investigation of this kind?

Mr. VOORHEES. I know no fact at all. On the contrary, it is for the purpose of investigating things that are said that are not facts to my certain knowledge. It seems publications have been made to the effect that certain persons claim to control certain Senators' votes or influence in that committee and on this floor, assertions that are as utterly false to my personal knowledge so far as I am concerned as that word can convey. I think it best that an investigation shall take place, and silence this talk or make those who indulge in it make charges direct.

Mr. MORRILL. I am perfectly willing that the newspapers should make any clamor that they see fit about any member of the Committee on Finance. I do not believe a word of it, nor do I think it necessary that we should have such an investigation as this. So far as I am concerned I treat it with entire contempt. I shall object to the passage of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of one has arrived.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let the resolution be printed and I will confer with the chairman of the Committee on Finance between now and to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over, and be printed.

MISSISSIPPI JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to correct a clerical error in a bill which was passed yesterday. The bill (S. No. 1168) to amend the several acts in relation to the division of the State of Mississippi into judicial districts, and further to amend the several acts in relation to the northern judicial district of the State of Mississippi, and to provide for the times and places of holding the United States district courts in said northern district, which passed yesterday, by a clerical error has omitted one county of the northern district. I desire to have it corrected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the bill been transmitted to the other House?

Mr. GEORGE. I understand not. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, so that the correction may be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on reconsidering the vote by which the bill was passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is now moved to reconsider the vote ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is now before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. I move that the word "Lee" be inserted in the ninth line of the first section, after the word "Oktibbeha."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DR. A. SIDNEY TEBBS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will proceed to the consideration of cases on the Calendar under the Anthony rule.

The consideration of the bill (S. No. 296) for the relief of Dr. A. Sidney Tebbs was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the pending amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment is the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, which will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. The committee report to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

That section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. INGALLS. Do I understand the Chair to say that that is a committee amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir; the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS. It is susceptible now of amendment, I suppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out, after the word "hereby," in the second line, the word "repealed," and inserting the words—

Amended by inserting after the word "who" in said section "having previously served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the United States, requiring the taking of an oath of allegiance thereto, and subsequently."

So that the section, as amended, will read:

No person who, having previously served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the United States, requiring the taking of an oath of allegiance thereto, and subsequently has served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion, shall be appointed to any position in the Army of the United States.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. ROLLINS. I move that this bill and the pending amendments be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary, and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRIS. That motion was acted on yesterday on the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment has been offered since; the Chair supposes that changes the status of the case.

Mr. ROLLINS. The motion is in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order.

Mr. ROLLINS. I demand the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to offer this as an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order yet.

Mr. INGALLS. An amendment in the second degree is now pending.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to read my proposed amendment:

And the class of persons excluded hereby shall be exempt from taxation, and in the event of a foreign or other war shall be exempt from military duty in the Army or Navy of the United States.

I propose to offer that as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I cannot understand the reluctance gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber manifest to meeting this question directly. It is proposed to repeal a certain section of the Revised Statutes, the import of which everybody understands. Section 1218 now prohibits any person who was in the confederate service from going into the Army of the United States, and it is conceded that the only persons now to be affected by it were young persons at the time of the war—boys perhaps—who might have been engaged in some capacity. Perhaps it may affect one or two, or half a dozen, young men who were at West Point; but it applies mainly to persons who were too young to take any real part in the late war. The only persons to be affected by it are those who had no connection whatever with the rebellion.

Now why should that remain any longer? The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] the other day said that he thought this section and some other provisions of law might very well be repealed, while he interposed objections to meeting the question now, and preferred its reference in order that it might be considered in connection with other matters. Here, however, is a simple, plain proposition whether section 1218 ought to be repealed, and we ought to meet that question without any reference whatever to any committee. There is not a gentleman in the Senate Chamber but what fully understands what is to be done; and wherefore the necessity of any reference to any committee? Can any committee enlighten us in reference to the import of that section? If not, why should it go there in order that we may have their judgment as to whether it ought to be repealed or not? We all understand what is to be done, and we have all made up our minds. There is not a Senator here but what has his own conviction of what is right and proper to be done in the premises. Why, therefore, should we refer it to any committee? Why should we hesitate to meet the question directly? Why should we try to send it to any committee, or why should we weaken this measure as is proposed to be done by the Senator from Kansas? Let us vote directly on the question. If it is right that the section should be repealed, let us repeal it. If it is improper that the section should be repealed, let us say so by our votes.

Mr. GARLAND. I am the author of the amendment which the Committee on Military Affairs has reported and which is now the subject of debate, and therefore I shall trouble the Senate again to say a few words upon it, because I wish to direct attention to the real question, as I conceive, that is in issue and the real motive that I had in introducing this measure. I think if the Senate will look at it carefully and dispassionately and try to consider it for a moment so far as it can, as if we had never had a war, there can be no good reason assigned for keeping this statute alive any longer.

I expressly disavowed all intention or all wish or desire in introducing this measure to excite any feeling at all in reference to the late war, to build up or to tear down any monument, or to break any household god connected with that war. I have not troubled myself with that; in fact I think that human life is too short to consider the question as to who was right in that controversy. My own deliberate judgment is that both sides were guilty of a great deal of wrong, and I am very desirous for one to help to repair that wrong which was done by both sides, and I disavow all intention of exciting another rebellion by the introduction of this measure which the Committee on Military Affairs have reported favorably.

I ask Senators now to look at the exact status of the question. The section reads:

SEC. 1218. No person who has served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion, shall be appointed to any position in the Army of the United States.

If this was intended as a restriction either by way of punishment, or anything else that you may choose to call it, on those who served in the rebellion, so far so good; but what restriction grows out of this statute, I may ask Senators. The single and the only one of serving in the Army. You have gentlemen upon this floor, you have gentlemen upon the floor of the other House who served the confederacy signally and well, who make laws to control your Army, who make laws to control the purse of the country, who make laws to control the President, and from him down to the lowest officer in the country; and yet he cannot enter the Army under section 1218. Yea, sir, the people can elect one of these gentlemen President of the United States, and he then is commander-in-chief of the Army. He can take your Army and lead it to the other side of the earth if he pleases, but yet he cannot hold a subordinate office in it under section 1218!

I say to Senators it is no restriction at all in effect. It is contradictory and inconsistent. If it were a punitive statute or a restrictive statute that comprehended the entire service of the country, it might rest on some reason; but you permit men of this class to go into your Navy, you permit them to come into Congress, you permit them to go into the Cabinet, you permit them to be made President or Vice-President, and yet they cannot hold a small Army office under this section 1218.

Mr. President, while I have not been clamorous about these punitive statutes in general, while I have not troubled myself considerably about them, yet here stands a statute that has not in itself a proper meaning at this day and time, when we consider that all the other restrictions have been taken away; and the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas does not reach the difficulty, in my humble judgment. It simply keeps this very matter here, of which I complain, merely as to your Army, when all the other doors to office are open to these men.

Now further, as stated by the Senator from Delaware, its principal effect is upon those who were beardless boys at the time the war came on. Nearly every session we have bills introduced here for the relief of A or B or C, as the case may be, under this section 1218. We have never refused to pass one of those bills for the relief of a particular person. Why keep the statute here if we are going every session to relieve these persons, and whenever a bill of this character is presented we are asked by some Senator, "Why not do it entirely and not by granting this relief by piecemeal?" and this is the second time that I have made the effort, and the second time, too, that we have had a favorable report to repeal this statute, so as to relieve us hereafter of this work for the relief of A, B, C, and D.

This is the whole case, and it is the whole reason that operates on me in offering the proposition which the Military Committee now propose to incorporate in this bill. I offered it once before as an amendment to the bill for Mr. Heiskell, of Maryland. It was reported favorably. I offer it again now in reference to Dr. Tebbs, and it is reported favorably. No committee can give us any further advice about it. The statute is plain; it is before us; it needs no interpretation. If any Senator knows of any one who should not be excepted from the operation of the statute, let him put that case in this bill, showing that the party has done something that makes him unworthy of relief; but as we are relieving these persons by special nets, let us take the statute out of the way entirely, and have no more trouble with it.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Arkansas that it is not necessary to refer this subject to a committee for consideration. I offered an amendment to the amendment proposed by the committee, in effect that any person who had taken an oath of allegiance to this Government and deliberately violated it and entered the service of a hostile power for the purpose of overthrowing it, should not hereafter be appointed to service in the Army of the United States. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] treats that as a joke.

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir. I beg the Senator's pardon. I am in dead earnest.

Mr. INGALLS. He treats it in a jocular and sneering manner, intimating that if those persons who having taken an oath of allegiance that they have deliberately violated are not to be again appointed to the Army, they shall be exempted from taxation and from military service in case of another war.

Mr. BUTLER. There is as much sense in the one as in the other.

Mr. INGALLS. There is exactly the difficulty with the Senator from South Carolina and the Southern statesmen with whom he is associated; they have never been able to understand that the war meant anything.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, Mr. President, when I go to apply for information and understanding, I shall certainly not apply to the Senator from Kansas. I think I understand exactly what the war meant as well as he does, and a great deal better, and it is not the correct and proper thing for the Senator to be lecturing the Senator from South Carolina about what he understands and what he does not understand.

Mr. INGALLS. The great difficulty, Mr. President, with the Senator from South Carolina, and those who think with him, is that they believe the war was fought about a point of constitutional etiquette, and was to be ended by a polite apology.

The Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY,] and others have protested passionately against test oaths and the statute of exclusion, upon the ground that they are monuments to the triumph of the victors in a civil strife, and they serve to perpetuate the desolating memories of an epoch that, having been forgiven, should also, as they assert, be forgotten.

I am one of those who have always sympathized to a great degree with the appeal that has been made in this direction, for I recognize the truth that, if the Republic is to endure, it cannot be made permanent by acts of Congress against disloyalty, and if the union of States is to be perpetual it must be because it stands upon the patriotic devotion and affection of its citizens of all parts of the country.

But, sir, the arguments employed by the Senators from South Carolina and Texas and Missouri are unfortunate; they render it impossible for men who believe as I do that the war having closed for seventeen years ought to be regarded as a controversy of the past, and that we should go forward into the future for the purpose of accomplishing new national results to vote with them. If the Senators from South Carolina and Missouri and Texas suppose that the North is magnanimous and willing to ignore what has been done because they have any doubts as to who was right in that great struggle, they are very much mistaken—very much mistaken indeed, sir.

The junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] asserted the other day in a pathetic peroration that notwithstanding all that had been done, notwithstanding the assumption that has heretofore been made that the war settled something, that God alone knew who was right in that controversy. My reading of history teaches me that the South fought in that contest to perpetuate human slavery and the North fought for the purpose of securing universal liberty; and the Senator from South Carolina says God alone knows who was right. The South fought to dismember and destroy the Union; the North fought for the indissoluble Union of the States. The Senator and his associates, now having again sworn to support the Constitution and its amendments, say that the Union ought to be preserved and maintained; and yet when these questions are revived they assert that notwithstanding their four years' of contest, God alone knows who was right; whether it was right to fight for the Union or against it; whether it was right to fight for human slavery or universal liberty. It is still an open question, notwithstanding four years of war, notwithstanding seventeen years of debate that have since followed, notwithstanding the amendments that have been imbedded in the organic law of the land. Even now God alone knows who was right!

Mr. HAMPTON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMPTON. I understand him to say that the North fought for universal liberty.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMPTON. Was that the ground taken by the North during the war and at the beginning of the war? Was that the ground that was taken when Congress passed a resolution declaring what the war was fought for? Was there any time up to nearly the close of the war when the North would not have recognized the existence of slavery had the South been content with the preservation of the Union? But I do not wish to discuss dead questions.

Mr. INGALLS. There is the difficulty with the Senator from South Carolina; he asserts that these questions are dead. They are not dead. Slavery is worse than liberty, and union is better than disintegration. In asserting that there is no such thing under our political system as loyalty, as patriotic devotion to the Union, as love of liberty and of freedom, the Senators from the South render it impossible for those who believe as they assert that by-gones should be by-gones to concur with them in attempting to obliterate the dissensions and allay the differences of opinion and policy that arose after that conflict was closed. It does not sound agreeably to men representing Northern constituencies to hear, as I have heard repeatedly on this floor, declarations by Southern Senators that Jefferson Davis stood on the same plane with John Hampden and George Washington; and if the Senator from South Carolina believes that, I tell him that no man in the North believes it, no matter what may be his convictions as to the course that ought now to be pursued toward those who were lately in rebellion.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator looked at me. I have not expressed any opinion about that or anything else.

Mr. INGALLS. I heard during a debate on the Mexican pension-bill within the past three years Senator after Senator on that side of the Chamber arise in his place and deliberately affirm that Jefferson Davis in patriotism, in devotion to human liberty, and as a representative of the greatest attributes in human nature was the peer of John Hampden or George Washington.

Mr. BUTLER. Why did the Senator apply it to me?

Mr. INGALLS. I think the Senator from South Carolina was one of those who joined in that debate. If he was not I regret to have made the allusion.

Mr. BUTLER. As I said a while ago, I do not remember what I said in that debate, but I am quite satisfied I uttered no such sentiment as that.

Mr. INGALLS. I will abide by the RECORD.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is now, as he has been always doing, putting up a man of straw simply for the sake of having something to knock down; that is all.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, within the last forty-eight hours in this Chamber the representative of a Southern constituency has stated that Robert E. Lee was in patriotism and devotion to country and loyalty the peer of any man who ever fought on American soil.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, Mr. President, had not that Senator a right to that opinion?

Mr. INGALLS. I say he had. I am not denying the right of individual opinion.

Mr. BUTLER. Is the Senator going to get mad with another Senator because he differs with him in opinion?

Mr. INGALLS. I am very much pleased; I am not enraged. If I were a vindictive partisan, as I am not, upon these matters, I should be very glad to have such speeches made here every day in the week and every week in the year.

Mr. BUTLER. Then why does the Senator complain?

Mr. INGALLS. Because neither the Senator nor any of his associates have disavowed it.

Mr. BUTLER. Am I to get up and disavow every sentiment uttered here?

Mr. INGALLS. During all the debates on these questions in this body for the last nine years, when such allegations have been made, I have never heard a Senator rise and disavow disbelief in them.

Mr. BUTLER. That is the most extraordinary proposition I have ever heard in my life from an intelligent man.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Allow me to ask the Senator a question?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I believe a short time ago the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES,] in the discussion of the Chinese question, referred to the policy of the Republican party in reference to the colored people in the South and announced that it was a failure. I did not hear the Senator from Kansas dissent from that conclusion, and according to his argument he is responsible for that opinion.

Mr. INGALLS. The reason the Senator did not hear me dissent is because I never have been the champion of the policy pursued by the Republican party in the South. In many respects it was an irreparable blunder, and we have since been paying the penalty for it. I do not propose to discuss that now.

I say to the Senators from South Carolina and the other Southern States——

Mr. BUTLER. I have not said anything in this debate, and I do not see why the Senator should be addressing himself to me. He selects me out.

Mr. INGALLS. I referred to the Senator's colleague.

Mr. BUTLER. I beg pardon. I thought I had been as mild as possible.

Mr. INGALLS. I referred to the Senator's colleague.

Mr. BUTLER. I beg pardon, then.

Mr. INGALLS. Arguments and appeals addressed to Republicans and Northern Senators for the obliteration of these statutes of exclusion, based upon the idea that there was no right and wrong in that controversy, that the men who fought against the Union were just as good as those who fought for it, will never find any response whatever in Northern hearts. The North made during that four years of controversy incredible sacrifices for personal liberty, fo freedom of conscience, for the independence of the States, and for the integrity of the Union.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator seems to be fighting against the freedom of conscience now.

Mr. INGALLS. And so long as any one is found to assert, or any party is found to maintain that there was no difference between the parties to that contest, so long will the North by enactment and by elections of representatives at the ballot-box continue to assert and maintain that what the North fought for in the war was right, and so long as these truths are denied by those upon the other side, so long these statutes in some form or other must stand.

Now, Mr. President, I have felt called to make these remarks not from any desire to appeal to sectionalism or to perpetuate the memories of the war, because I have avowed myself repeatedly the friend of a liberal and generous policy upon these subjects; but the utterances that have been made, notably by the Senator from Florida and by the Senator from South Carolina, compel me to say that unless this proposition as reported by the committee is amended it will never receive my assent.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, the opposition to the repeal of this section of the statutes must have some special reason to sustain it. This section of the statutes provides that no one who was in the United States Army when the rebellion broke out and joined the confederacy, and no other person who rendered any service to the confederacy in any capacity, shall hereafter be appointed to a position in the Army. That is substantially its provision.

Now, to show what an arrant humbug the opposition to the repeal of this section is, it is only necessary to call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the fact that, with his entire approbation, old Army officers who were in the Army when the rebellion broke out and resigned their commissions, just as General Lee did, have been holding office during the entire ascendancy of the Republican party since the rebellion was put down.

Mr. INGALLS. Not in the Army.

Mr. VOORHEES. Take the case of General Longstreet as a distinguished instance, not meaning to say a single disrespectful word of him. As soon as he joined the Republican party, although he was an old Army officer that had committed this unpardonable sin in the light of this section, he became good enough for any office in the gift of the Republican party, and they would have put him in the Army likewise just as well had it not been that it would be a precedent for some one else to get in.

Now, what is the difference between appointing a man to a big office in civil life and appointing him to an office in the Army? The opposition to the repeal of this section, and in fact the section itself, proceeds, I suppose, on the idea that there was a peculiar perfidy, a peculiar dishonesty, a peculiar treachery, a peculiar disloyalty to the Government in an Army officer wearing the uniform laying down his sword and turning his back on the Government which had educated him and which he had undertaken to defend. Therefore, according to the reasoning of this section, he should never be employed in like manner again because of his treachery, because of his perfidy; but cannot a man be treacherous in some other place as well as in the Army? Take for instance a judicial officer; there are instances to-day in the judiciary where men betrayed their trust and resigned their positions when the war broke out, and when the war was over made their peace with the ruling powers and had their positions back again. Is it less injurious to this Government to place a man as its representative at a foreign court with the honor of this country in his hands than to place him back in the Army? The Senator from Kansas, and so did every other Senator on that side, voted to confirm General Longstreet as minister to an important court abroad where he was to hold the honor of this country, and where if he was so perfidious, so treacherous, and had been proven so by his resignation of his old Army command, he could have stabbed the honor of this Government to its heart.

There is no logic in this opposition at all. If men who were in the Army when the war broke out and resigned their positions are fit for one position they are fit for another. If they are fit for high positions on the bench, fit for foreign appointments, fit for Cabinet places, they are fit for these likewise. Will it do to say that you will not trust such a man in one place, but will trust him in all others? There is an incongruity about this, and the sooner this section is swept away the sooner we shall have no more scenes like these.

The Senator from Kansas complains of those who on this side of the Chamber say that these issues are dead. He says that they are alive; that the North fought for universal liberty and, to use his own language, the South fought to establish slavery. Both propositions are wrong; neither statement is correct. The South found slavery established; they did not fight to establish it. It was among them, placed there by your ancestors as well as theirs; placed there by a common government. I can go to the Congressional Library this day and pick out old newspapers and read advertisements for runaway slaves in papers in Massachusetts. The institution of slavery was all over the land. It was an evil. I say here in the midst of my Southern friends it was a frightful evil, a terrible disorder, but it spread over the North as afterward it spread over the South. The North got clear of its slaves when they ceased to be profitable. The South held on to theirs because they were profitable, and in a moment of needless alarm, I say, committing a great mistake in history, they sought to make a separate and independent government. I am glad they did not succeed. This Government divided, there would have been a bloody line from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, where war would have raged perpetually. I believe that a great overruling, overmastering Providence settled the question correctly on the basis of a restored Union and with slavery no more in this land. But when Republican Senators arise here and say that they fought for universal liberty, I know better.

I was a member of Congress during every hour that a gun was fired on this continent in that great civil war. I was in the lower branch of Congress from the firing on Fort Sumter to Appomattox, and I know that resolution after resolution passed in the shape and nature of a protest to convince the South that we were not fighting to liberate their slaves. Was I not in that body that dark lowering day next after the first battle of Bull Run when our broken troops poured back into this capital, and when the sky, shrouded in gloom, was the darkest I ever saw; when we huddled together in the House of Representatives and the venerable and distinguished patriot and statesman from Kentucky, John J. Crittenden, offered the resolution which bears his name in order to calm the apprehensions if possible of those who thought the Government was going to run into a wild anti-slavery crusade—a resolution protesting that this war was to be conducted not for the destruction of established institutions, but for their preservation; not for the destruction of the power of the States over their domestic affairs, but to keep intact that power? And if there was a Republican on that floor who voted against that resolution, I fail to remember him.

That resolution came over to this Chamber in hot haste, for there was hurry that day; there was agitation in the very air; it was carried on a run. That resolution was adopted unanimously in this body. The distinguished Senator opposite me from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] was in this body at that time; he can correct me, and I ask him to do so, if I state incorrectly when I say that that resolution passed this body without one dissenting vote, protesting to the world, advising your own countrymen, and advising the nations of the earth that you were not doing that which the Senator from Kansas just now said you were, but proclaiming; and the records of course proclaim it to this hour, that the contrary was true. The statement of the Senator from Kansas that you were fighting for universal liberty is an afterthought; it was not true at the time the fighting was going on, and it was never declared to be true then. That protest was never taken back.

I well remember when Mr. Greeley addressed Abraham Lincoln on the subject of making the destruction of slavery a part of the war programme. He said, "No; I would save the Union; that is my object; I would save it with slavery." Thus he spoke the specific words: "I would save it with slavery, or I would save it without." No crusade for universal liberty then!

Mr. President, I had not the slightest idea of engaging in this debate, but as we glide along on the river of time toward the final close, sometimes there are attempts made to make history so grotesque and out of harmony with the truth that even I cannot sit still and hear them go without protest. This is one of the occasions. With the offices of this country filled by the votes on that side of the Chamber, with men who betrayed the Government as much as anybody did, for them now to make a clamor against the repeal of this section is one of those incongruities that I want to point out. And when Senators rise here and assert as a cause of the war on either side that which is an absolute variance from the facts of history, it ought not to go unchallenged.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I in some respects greatly regret that this debate has arisen. I have kept silent when there were many things to which I would have been glad to reply. A sectional discussion, or rather a discussion reviving the issues of the war, has been precipitated upon the Senate, not by the action of any Republican Senator. The original bill for the relief of Mr. Tebbs, which would have permitted him under the usual proper regulations to enter the service of the United States, would have passed this Chamber without an objection. It was an exceptional case of a man who had engaged in the war, on the confederate side, in the days of his extreme youth, and who is believed, according to the representations of his friends, to be a man of excellent character and qualifications. I know of nobody who would have objected to his becoming an Army surgeon; but thereupon comes a Senator, excluded himself by section 1218 from an opportunity to take service in the Army of the United States—he may not desire it, but he is excluded by law—and moves to repeal that statute.

Speech after speech has been made upon it on the Democratic side; only two Senators (and they very briefly indeed) have said anything upon this side to revive these old questions. I am willing to let them rest. Time is disposing of many of them without argument. But we have heard from a number of gentlemen affected by this particular section appeals to us to wipe this statute off, not upon the ground that time has made it unnecessary, but upon the ground that it was originally wrong. It is not repeal that they ask, but repentance. The moment they take that ground they sound the long roll and call into line the forces that organized twenty years ago for and against the Union. I say the war for the Union was right; I say the war against the Union was wrong; but there are men here who have tried to make us believe that it did not make much difference which side they were on, and that by this time it does not make any difference how the Senate of the United States votes as to which was right and which was wrong.

The Senator from Indiana tells us we did not fight for human liberty. I am greatly tempted to devote three or four minutes to brushing away some common trash upon that subject.

The Congress of the United States, representing the North and the loyal sentiment of the whole country, was perfectly willing to see the rebels lay down their arms and the flag wave triumphantly and peacefully over the whole Union, even if slavery did continue to exist. That is true, and one cannot infer more than that. Mr. Lincoln voiced the loyal sentiment of the country when he said that he was willing to restore the Union even if slavery remained——

Mr. VOORHEES. I may have misunderstood the Senator. Does the Senator represent me as saying that the North did not fight to restore the Union?

Mr. HAWLEY. No. This was the Senator's expression—I wrote it down at the time—that the North "did not fight for universal liberty." On that point the Senator took issue with the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Now, sir, let us deal frankly and truly with this question. I never was either a Whig or a Democrat, but an old Abolitionist and a Radical from the beginning. I do not know what the word "Stalwart" implies, but very likely I am not stalwart enough. I never belonged to any party that did not fight slavery from the time I became a voter, in the autumn of 1847. A great deal of nonsense is talked on this subject. The issue that shook this continent and the world was one between human liberty and human slavery. That is exactly what it was; disguised, diverted, in many ways concealed, sometimes denied, that was the issue at the foundation of the great struggle.

The sentiment of the free people of the country said that slavery must not go into the Territories; it said that the repeal of the Missouri compromise was an outrage upon the plighted faith of the nation; and that sentiment carried the Presidential election of 1860 under constitutional forms. A portion of the country undertook to secede. Even those with whom I united and sympathized, even the Abolitionists themselves, were perfectly willing to leave the destruction of slavery to legitimate natural causes and political influences under the Constitution; but they were never willing to say that they desired that slavery might live, never willing to accept it, never willing to give slavery any color of natural right; and when the war broke out and Congress did make the declarations to which I have referred, that if the rebels would come back here and lay down their arms the North would let slavery alone as it was, they simply meant that they would kill it in their own peaceful way. That is what they meant and they never should have told the South anything else, because anything else was not frank and candid. They did deny the right to extend it into the Territories. They claimed that the Constitution and policy of this country fundamentally and generally were in favor of universal liberty; that slavery was a local exception; that it had some measure of toleration; that they were willing to see it abolished by means of various measures of gradual emancipation in obedience to the moral and religious sentiment of the world. All that they said; but that they were willing to guarantee it they never said, nor could you have ever got the loyal sentiment of this country to promise that slavery should live one hundred years, or fifty years, or twenty-five years as the price of saving the Union. When the lines were drawn, to tell the truth before God and man, it was essentially a war between slavery and liberty.

The champions of the Union postponed the time of the proclamation of universal emancipation—delayed, and delayed, and delayed measures to that end, hoping, and hoping, and hoping for union without resort to radical action; but the time came when they proclaimed freedom, and from that moment on there was a new fire in the heart of the people of this country, and when they sang the song of John Brown it was not mere sentiment. It put red-hot blood in every vein of the soldiers of our Army; and old Democrats, old Whigs, old Freesoilers joined in it. The first regiment I heard of as singing that famous refrain was one commanded by Fletcher Webster, son of the great expounder and defender. From that time the war went on. It was three years before this Northern people were in earnest. They drew their lines and adopted again and again the simile of Winfield Scott—the anaconda drawn around the Southern confederacy would strangle it. They waited and they temporized and they paltered. It was not until the winter of 1863-'64 that the conviction really came to the people of the North that the whole South—many of us knew it well long before—was dead in earnest in this matter. It was not, I may say, until the spring of 1864 that the nation really rallied with all its full power; and, sir, if we had not won in 1864 we should have continued it in 1865; if we had not won in 1865 we should have continued it till 1868, because if I may judge by those around me we had but begun to fight and but begun to die so long as the Union was not preserved.

Let us talk sincerely and candidly. My Southern friends, after we had taken this ground—the Union must and shall be maintained, there is no institution or system of any description whatever that shall stand in the way of it—if we were right certain things logically and necessarily followed. We say we were right. How are we ever going to decide? Some Senator says God only knows. I bow reverently and admit it; but there are certain ways of arriving at that which must be accepted as right among men, and the last awful and great resort is the tribunal of war. We could go no further. We submitted to that, and that which we of the Union call right won; and therefore, so far as human laws and institutions and duties are concerned, leaving further judgment to the Judgment Day, so far as we practically are concerned, our side was and is right.

Nor will I vote for any measure, however trifling in importance it may appear, which demands that I shall repent of anything that was a logical incident to the one grand purpose. It was right to raise troops, it was right to incur debt, it was right to proclaim emancipation, it was right to disfranchise rebels, it was right to confiscate, it was right to forbid rebels holding office in the Army, it was right to do every one of a hundred logically incident things that we did do to carry out the one great purpose.

I know that as time passes we are willing to modify and we ought to modify. General Grant did not wait to ride through Richmond nor Petersburgh, he hardly waited to brush the dust or take a meal before he telegraphed from Appomattox to Washington to stop recruiting, and then followed peace and the rapid disbandment of the great Army, and then came the painful duties of reconstruction, more embarrassing than the necessities of war, and measure after measure was passed. It was a queer time, a strange time. There were problems that puzzled the statesmen of the world, and we blundered perhaps. So we did; I will admit it; we stumbled and staggered along, but yet nevertheless with the great resolute purpose to establish the Union and establish universal liberty, I affirm that we did the best we could, and as to all the great chief measures, I say more than that, we did right, and whatever our kindly feeling may be toward any human being, I submit that the most ardent confederate——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The hour of two o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Connecticut may conclude his remarks. ["Go on!" "Go on!"]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Connecticut will proceed.

Mr. HAWLEY. All these measures of reconstruction, all the chief and principal measures I hold were right, and I was about to appeal to the most resolute and earnest confederate, and the bravest and ablest soldier and statesman among them with this question: Would you ask me to give any vote here that would say that we in the field or those who legislated here were wrong?

Mr. BUTLER. Has anybody asked the Senator to do so?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Where and when?

Mr. HAWLEY. In the appeals made on this very bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Why, Mr. President, has anybody asked the Senator to do anything of that kind? I confess, after all this discussion, I do not see on the face of the earth what that which he has been talking about has to do with it. Because I get up on the floor of the Senate and say that I think it is unwise for a statute to remain on the statute-book, whatever may have been its rightfulness or wrongfulness at the time, because I say I think it is unwise to continue it, the Senator lashes himself into a fury.

Mr. HAWLEY. No, no.

Mr. BUTLER. He reads us a lecture; he talks about prosecuting the war to abolish slavery, and about destroying people. There is nothing on the face of the earth to justify the discussion that I can see. I have taken no part in this debate because I do not think it is a matter of consequence.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is that the question?

Mr. BUTLER. But the Senator called for my question.

Mr. HAWLEY. I claim the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. Because I said——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut declines to yield further.

Mr. HAWLEY. I yielded for a question.

Mr. BUTLER. I have propounded the question: has anybody asked the Senator to say what he has stated he is called on to say?

Mr. HAWLEY. I propose to go on to show it. I deny being lashed into a fury or lashing anybody else into a fury. I never was more careful or more deliberate in what I said. That I speak with feeling I trust is excusable. That I am as extreme as those on the other side I deny. The Senator from South Carolina says that nobody has asked us to repeal this section on the ground that the original enactment was unwise or was wrong.

Mr. BUTLER. No; the Senator said we could not ask him to vote that it was wrong. Nobody asked him to do anything of the kind: I have not heard it.

Mr. HAWLEY. Very well; state it in the way most acceptable to the Senate. I assert that we have been invited to repeal the statute on the ground that it was originally wrong.

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir; I have not heard that proposition.

Mr. HAWLEY. On the ground that it was enacted in the heat of the sectional feelings of the war. That was one expression used in regard to it. An expression used again and again was that it was a monument of hate; and again it was said that the statute is a reminder of sectional strife and sectional bitterness.

Mr. BUTLER. Who said that?

Mr. HAWLEY. There was expression after expression to that effect made here, that it was a thing unjust to do and ungenerous to do, after we had accepted the surrender of the confederate officers and largely admitted them to the enjoyment of civil rights. I justly state, as every Senator must concede, the spirit of the debate. I say, sir, that this particular measure was right and wise at the time, and was one of those things that were inevitable concomitants and incidents of our legislation, after the war, if we desired to maintain and preserve that which we had won.

Gentlemen speak sometimes as if, because we admit their honesty therefore we admit our injustice. It is one thing to admit, as we do very candidly, that they were to a great extent entirely honest and sincere, but it does not follow therefore that we were wrong. It does follow that we should treat them with courtesy and with kindness, considering and acknowledging their perfect personal sincerity; but that did not absolve us from the duty of legislating and even from the duty even now of maintaining some things that look in the face of them to be severe and harsh. It is not through personal unkindness; it is not through ill will toward them personally, but because it was a great war, because it buried hundreds of thousands of men, and we may not trifle with what was won by it. If it was not right, very right, and an awful and imperative duty, then it was murder, and that it was not. That it was right we left to the God of battles, and the decision happened to be with us, and that we must maintain.

I read long ago what seemed to me a very wise rule in cases of this kind to this effect: we must judge men by the light they had, but measures by the light we have. I judge the gentlemen who were engaged in that war by their life-long education and that of their ancestors under the influence of slavery; I judge them by the teaching of the doctrine of secession which they heard in their academies and in their law schools. I am willing to give to them all possible concessions and pay them all their just dues in the matter of personal regard for their belief in principle and for their gallantry in the field in defense of their ideas; but it remains for me to judge of the right and the wrong, and of the great constitutional and legislative measures necessary to sustain the war. Upon that judgment I must stand, and I cannot vote in any other way.

There are many other things that occur to me, but I am not going to enter upon this broad field of general questions any further than I have done. I am glad to make from time to time relaxations of the rigid rules adopted during and after the war; time shows that we can dispense with many of them. I think we can modify this. If the bill had come from the Judiciary Committee even accompanied with certain modifications of the test oath prudently devised, and appearing to be—for a great deal depends upon appearance in this thing, a great deal, as you will find——

Mr. BUTLER. I want to ask the Senator——

Mr. HAWLEY. Let me finish my statement; you will confuse it if you interrupt me now. If a bill or a series of bills had come from the Judiciary Committee, reviewing this field of restrictive measures, reported deliberately and carefully by such a man as the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and based upon ground that time and all its mellowing influences showed that these things might well be relaxed for the good of the country; such a measure or measures deliberately presented and supported, as they would have been, by able arguments, would have passed nemine contradicente through both Houses of Congress. But the very moment a measure is proposed and a virtual demand is made by men themselves engaged in the rebellion—do not ask me whether I regard them kindly or not, that is another question—the moment a virtual demand is made by them that these things shall be repealed because they are evidences of sectional strife and monuments of hate, and because they reflect upon the honor of gentlemen who happen to be affected, then you draw the lines and compel me to fall back on my position, that what we did to carry on that war was right, and that the incidental measures of legislation and action resulting from the general purpose were right. The moment that position is taken I wait for the time of relaxation and repeal; I simply say, "No, sir; those things were right, and until we argue on a different ground I cannot vote with you."

COURT OF APPEALS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the Senate bill No. 420.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (S. No. 420) to establish a court of appeals, the pending question being on the amendment reported from the Committee on the Judiciary in section 10, [11,] line 25, after the word "opinion," to strike out the following words:

> And in patent and copyright cases in equity a review by the Supreme Court may be had, without regard to the sum or value in dispute, upon the questions both of law and fact affecting the validity or the infringement of the patent or the copyright: Provided, That the court of appeals shall certify that a question is involved of sufficient importance to render it proper that the final decision thereof should be made by the Supreme Court.

And insert in lieu thereof:

> Provided, That in all cases in which by existing laws the Supreme Court may now exercise appellate jurisdiction without regard to the sum in controversy, except in cases touching patent rights and copyrights, the Supreme Court shall continue to have and exercise such jurisdiction in the manner now provided by law.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Supposing, Mr. President, that something which I said yesterday tended to justify the comment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] that I proposed to give away the amendment which is now under consideration, I wish to disabuse the Senate upon that point. I am in favor of the bill exactly as it came from the Judiciary Committee; that is, in favor of the scheme of the bill, and also of all amendments which were put on it by the committee. The bill as reported is the matured thought of the committee. Of course, nine gentlemen meeting together will have differences of opinion. These differences have been stated, compared, and the bill itself as amended is the general result of the best judgment of the committee in relation to this subject.

It is true that when I introduced the bill it contained the provision which is now under consideration to be stricken out if the Senate agree with the views of the committee upon that subject. When this bill was reported I agreed to give up any preconceived notions that I may have had on that subject, and I cannot now say that the views of the committee are not the wisest.

The scheme of the bill is that the Supreme Court shall not find the facts in any given class of cases, that the cases shall go up to them upon the law from the intermediate court of appeals. This is one of the great means of remedying the evils which now exist in the Supreme Court preventing them from hearing cases. If they can hear the law of the case, and do not have to find the facts, they can get through with four or five times as much business as they do now. The committee thought that there was no reason why a man who sued upon a patent should have any more right than anybody else who brought suit, for instance, in admiralty, in which the facts really are the main thing to be found, the law of the case being very simple. That was the reason they excepted from the provision here inserted patent and copyright cases, which have been heretofore brought before the Supreme Court on the law and the facts and without regard to the amount in controversy; and they thought, too, that if a patent right was heard in the court of original jurisdiction and then in the court of appeals, after the facts were found, and there was any question connected with it which had not been decided by the Supreme Court, it would be certified to the Supreme Court by the appellate tribunal. Everything goes up to the Supreme Court from this appellate tribunal that involves $10,000, or a Federal question, or a question of law without regard to the amount involved on which the court of appeals believe there should be a decision by the Supreme Court.

The facts are found by the court below entirely. When two courts have passed upon a question of fact, one the court of original jurisdiction and the other the court of appeals, this bill proceeds upon the theory that there should be an end, and that the Supreme Court should pass only upon questions of law arising out of the record.

Now, sir, I cannot say that the scheme of this bill as reported is not better than the scheme of the bill that I introduced on that subject. The committee thought that equality should be preserved, equality in legal rights, and that no one who had a claim to sue should be preferred to another, unless it be the Government, where of course for obvious reasons the matter should be considered by the Supreme Court without regard to the amount in controversy. The committee considered that the facts of the case should be found below, and that no person suing in any capacity, unless he recovered a certain amount of judgment, should have a right per se to appeal, but if the court below thought the question involved was of sufficient importance to go to the Supreme Court, it ought to be allowed to go, and the court of appeals would necessarily send it. That is all I wish to say.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I do not propose to do anything to endanger the passage of this bill, and if the Judiciary Committee felt, as was expressed by some Senators here, that the failure to adopt this amendment would endanger the passage of the bill, I should hesitate very long before expressing, as I have done in a very humble way, my reasons for thinking that the amendment is not desirable. I shall vote for the bill with the amendment or without the amendment, because I think it is a measure which is very much needed and of very great importance. Neither do I desire to discuss the question of the usefulness of patents or the influence which they have upon our development or progress. That I shall be willing to do on another occasion. I trust I shall be able to show, if the time and opportunity should ever come, that they are not burdens upon our industries, but that our industries have kept steady pace with the growth and development of the inventions of this country, and that the country owes to-day more of its prosperity, more of its strength, to the inventive genius of its people and our patent system than to any other one source. I do not go into that now.

But it was said yesterday that no reason could be shown why this amendment should not be adopted; that no reason could be shown why there should be final jurisdiction in the Supreme Court of the United States rather than in the court of appeals which is provided for by this bill. Now, it does occur to me that there are many reasons. In the first place, such has been the settled policy of this Government, adopted I cannot but believe for good reasons. The property in a patent differs from all other species of property, and if it be attacked it is attacked in every circuit of the United States simultaneously. It is one which the Government grants, and therefore the Supreme Court of the United States should, as it seems to me, take final jurisdiction of all questions arising under the patent law, the same as they do of all questions arising under the revenue law or of all questions against officers who have been collecting under the revenue law. In a certain sense the Government itself is a party, because it has granted the right and is bound to defend it.

But the principal objection to this amendment lies, as I suggested yesterday, in the very great confusion which must inevitably arise if the final jurisdiction in patent cases is left to this court of appeals. This court is to sit in nine different circuits. Questions relating to the infringement of any patent or the validity of any patent are likely to arise, and must if the patent is valuable inevitably arise in every one of these circuits; and when we reflect upon what was said by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN,] that in the different reported cases in this country you may find different decisions upon every legal question which is raised, when we reflect upon the condition of public sentiment with reference to patents, and when we reflect that a suit may be tried well in one circuit and poorly tried in another, it is inevitable that there will be different decisions upon precisely the same state of facts in the different circuits and in the court of appeals in the different circuits. What have you then? You have, say, four of the courts in the nine circuits holding that a patent is valid, five of them perhaps holding that it is invalid, or vice versa. The inevitable effect of it is to destroy the value of the patent. Take, for instance, the invention of the telephone—and I use that because it is one of the most valuable inventions of the present age, and one which I apprehend can excite no prejudice. There are contending parties as to who is the inventor; there are different patents; they are the subject of present litigation; but the question will be the same in each of these circuits, and before each of these courts, as to whether a certain telephone patent is a valid one, or as to whether a certain machine infringes that patent. Now suppose that in two of the circuits where the question is sure to arise it shall be decided, for instance, that Mr. Bell's telephone patent is valid and that a certain machine infringes it; it will be decided in two other of the circuits that it is invalid or that the machine does not infringe it; what is the value of the telephone invention to the patentee? It is destroyed and gone. I cannot conceive why there ought not to be the right of a final decision in the Supreme Court in all these cases.

All that I ask is that the court may certify questions of importance like these, questions of conflicting decisions like those I have suggested, to the Supreme Court of the United States, to the end that they may be settled finally; and it is as much for the interest of those who use the patent as for the interest of those who invent it that there shall be some method by which all this uncertainty, this confusion of conflicting decisions, can be avoided in such cases. It seems to me that nothing else than this will protect the right which the Government solemnly, under its Constitution, grants to its citizen.

As I said before, I shall vote for the bill without the amendment or with the amendment, but I should like an expression of the Senate upon the subject.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, yesterday the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] intimated that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] and myself, who were somewhat in charge of this bill in the Senate, had given away the amendment which is now under discussion. In order to place myself in a proper light before the Senate in reference to the matter, I will simply state, not transgressing the rules in reference to proceedings before committees, that the amendment was put in the bill against my conviction and against my vote, and with an express reservation of my right to vote on the amendment in the Senate as I pleased; to oppose it or move to modify it in any way I might see proper. So, while advocating the passage of the bill, I have thought the preponderating reason was against this amendment. At the same time, like the Senator from Connecticut, I expect to vote for this bill with or without this amendment. I do not regard its adoption as being a sine qua non to the passage of the bill.

Now, I beg leave of the Senate in a few words to explain definitely my view about it, which I did not do as fully yesterday as probably I should have done.

In the 20th volume of Howard's Reports—I will take just one out of the many cases—in the case of Brown vs. Shannon and others, the opinion in which was delivered by Chief Justice Taney in 1857, it was held:

> Where a bill is filed to enforce the specific execution of a contract in relation to the use of a patent right, this court has no appellate jurisdiction, unless the matter in controversy exceeds $2,000.

The court goes on to show in this cause the great difficulty that exists in reference to fixing absolutely the amount involved, by what standard, by what criterion this is to be estimated. Some asserted that the bond was sufficient, but the court held that was not the test; and finally they wind up by denying a man the right of appeal because there was not an absolute showing that as much as $2,000 was then involved. That was the sum fixed as the maximum under which an appeal should not be granted under the act of Congress prevailing at that time. It was afterward raised to $5,000.

The court in this opinion shows the difficulty in reference to these cases. If the Senate will examine the debates that brought about the passage of the statute, to which I shall refer in a moment, it will be seen that it was produced in a great measure by the difficulty that the court announce in this and in cases previous to this when Taney was Chief-Justice of the court. The statute is:

> SEC. 699. A writ of error may be allowed to review any final judgment at law, and an appeal shall be allowed from any final decree in equity hereinafter mentioned, without regard to the sum or value in dispute:
> First. Any final judgment at law or final decree in equity of any circuit court, or of any district court acting as a circuit court, or of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or of any Territory, in any case touching patent rights or copyrights.

That statute was passed on the 8th of July, 1870, after this decision by Chief-Justice Taney in the case I have just referred to, and the debates on its passage referred to the previous decisions of the court and show the difficulty under which the court always labored in fixing this matter of appeal, because at the time of an application for an injunction against the infringement of a patent no right has accrued, no fruits have accrued from the invention, the matter is entirely in futuro, and it is not within the power or compass of the plaintiff to show what amount is involved. That statute was passed in 1870, twelve years ago. The Supreme Court have adjudicated numbers and numbers of cases under it without ever inquiring into the amount involved. I think this amendment is an innovation not justifiable in this great interest going before the courts in cases arising from patents and from copyrights. That is the ground upon which I place my opposition in committee and the ground on which I place it now.

The argument of the Senator from Kansas yesterday as to the way this patent business is managed is entirely apart from this question. That is one question; this is another question. I am not familiar with, in fact I have very little knowledge in reference to that matter, but since it is a governmental grant, since it is a matter that the sovereignty of the Government carries to the party, it seems to me in addition to the fact of the difficulty that courts have labored under in fixing the amount involved under this statute that we may as well leave the law as it is in this regard. I therefore prefer this feature of the bill as it was originally introduced, the part which the committee have struck out, in preference to the amendment proposed to be inserted. Of course it is for the Senate to say. I shall not stand upon the matter so far as the bill is concerned, but I prefer the language of the bill in its original shape to this amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Connecticut in a purpose to vote for this bill whether this amendment is retained or not. I do not think that I am quite as earnest in my desire for the rejection of the amendment as he is, although I think the bill would be better, wiser, and more just as originally framed.

The Senator from Kansas put this question yesterday to the Senate: What is there of so much sacredness in a patent which requires a different policy or a different privilege to be extended to the owners of the property in a patent right which is not extended to the owner of a horse or a farm? The answer to that question is a very simple one and a very clear one. Usually it is not often the case that the owner of a horse or a farm is disturbed by more than one claimant. Persons are not tempted to attack men's property in horses or farms unless they have a good title, or at least a good show of title on which to rest their attack. But a patent right is a constant and perpetual subject of attack the Union over.

Every man whose property consists in the exclusive right to his own invention is exposed to attacks from every other man who desires either to use or manufacture that invention in his business. The settlement of the question with one man very frequently does not settle it in the least with any other wrong-doer or infringer; and the result is that we have, I presume, hundreds, certainly dozens, of applications made to Congress based on this condition of facts, a condition of facts thoroughly proved, that during the entire seventeen years' life of a patent a person to whom letters-patent have issued, and who is the unquestioned owner, derives no benefit, but on the contrary is impoverished by the fact that infringers, conspirators, wealthy manufacturers, pirates, or sometimes misled and honest men who believe honestly that they have rights, have consumed the entire life of the patent and the entire substance of the patentee in lawsuits which did not come to a final and conclusive determination until nearly or quite the close of the whole period of seventeen years. So that the finding by a lower tribunal in one circuit of the facts in a suit with A does not in the least benefit the owner of the patent or protect him against a contrary finding on the facts before a tribunal in another circuit and in a suit with B; and there is no class of property except patent and copyright to which such considerations apply.

But on the other hand, in legislating, representing as I do a community crowded with inventors, what is my duty? Within ten miles of my residence have lived men whose inventions have increased the wealth of this country by hundreds and thousands of millions. The great wire-fence invention, which has made it possible to enclose the fields and farms over vast spaces on this continent where there is no timber; the cotton-gin, which multiplied by three the value of every acre of cultivable land throughout the entire South, or a large part of it; the sewing-machine; the great agricultural inventions have had their origin in that community; but still I am perfectly aware that in legislating to protect these rights we must have great regard to the public sentiment of other sections of the country where the population is made up largely of persons who are purchasers of these patented inventions, who have not made them themselves and who complain bitterly of the royalties which they are obliged to pay, sometimes quite unreasonably, and they are sometimes the victims of designing sharpers who undertake to fleece them and black-mail them by pretending to have patent rights which they really have not.

Mr. President, the patent law must be so framed as to work itself and to commend itself to the favor of the public sentiment of these portions of the country. The agricultural regions of the Northwest and the South must learn—the patent law must be imperfect, must conform to their desires in some of these respects until they do learn—the value of the protection of patent property to them and to their communities. A great State like Iowa or Indiana, full of educated brain, full of farms, to be full of manufactures and of manufacturing interests, will learn soon enough not to prevent some inconvenience, not to prevent some injustice, but practically soon enough to secure a wise and judicious policy for the protection of the patent interests of this country, that their own interests are bound up and are best promoted by it.

The South is learning it already, and some of the most wise, liberal, and judicious minds that have dealt with the patent laws in recent years in this country have been Senators of Southern States who saw the importance to the great communities which they represent, of encouraging the inventive genius which would improve their capacity for agriculture, and will bring also to their own doors the manufactures which will enable them to make the profit in manufacturing the raw material that they create. So it is to be very soon with these great States.

Almost all of the new woolen machinery which is being erected in this country is being erected in the Northwest. The manufacture of agricultural implements, one which gives rise more than almost any other occupation to new inventions, and which has so much stimulated the inventive genius of this country, the class of manufactures in which this country is far superior to any country on earth, from which we drive out in countries like Austria, like Australia, and South America the long established manufactures of England—these manufacturers of agricultural machinery are leaving their home and origin in New England, and are being established in the great States of the Northwest. The tanning business, the manufacture of shoes, already the most important single industry in my own State, are colonizing and our great shoe manufacturers are establishing already their branches in those States where the hides are to be found at their doors.

I have no fear, therefore, that sooner or later a just and fair and liberal patent system will commend itself to the judgment of the representatives of these States, and that no wise man will be found putting himself on record in favor of any permanent and flagrant injustice to the inventors of the country.

I do not therefore care to make for myself (although I agree with my friend from Connecticut) any serious or earnest controversy with the policy upon which this section in the bill is founded.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the principles upon which the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is extended in any case are those which should determine the fact whether the given case should come within its appellate powers. The magnitude of the interest involved, subject to the constitutional jurisdiction, is the determining point. Now, no person can say that where a right to a patent is concerned the magnitude of the interest involved is not sufficient to give that court jurisdiction. It in most cases is very large. In the individual instance, it may be very small; but so far as the validity of the patent is concerned which is involved in any suit for the infringement of it, the value of it cannot be estimated. There can therefore be no argument and no reason given why the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in every case affecting the validity of a patent or its infringement should not be a matter of right. I venture to assert that proposition.

There is a mode of testing things by reason, and not by mere assertion. Senators have said here that there was no reason why a patent should be placed in respect to the jurisdiction of the case upon a different ground from anything else. I say that there is a reason, and the same reason upon which this bill gives the appellate jurisdiction in all other cases, and that is the magnitude of the interest involved. If we are to discuss this, there is no reason that can be given in support of the bill as brought here by the committee which predicates the appellate power of the Supreme Court upon the magnitude of the interest involved, which does not apply here. What greater magnitude can there be than a question that involves a monopoly, a patent right, or the infringement of a right conferred by law and extending over fifty millions of people.

I concur fully in the arguments which have been made by the able Senators from Massacusetts and Connecticut, with both of whom I have the honor to serve upon the Committee on Patents. I recognize the wisdom of the law, and the beneficial effect of it, securing to inventors a compensation, whether you put it in the shape of an exclusive right to use their invention, or a moneyed compensation, in any form whatever. I say that human intellect, that genius, that invention is something that concerns the nation; that it is the public interest to encourage it, and that the greatest facility should be extended to those who create valuable inventions, who make productions cheaper to the mass of mankind, who make labor produce far greater results. That is an object of wise and beneficial legislation; and the inventor, the creator of this public benefit, should be protected by laws best adapted for his compensation and for his protection. How can you do it if you limit his appeal to the supreme judicial power in the country when he cannot determine with certainty his right to compensation from this, his invention, the creation of his mind? Why, sir, in my judgment the case of patents and of copyrights stands upon its own distinct and independent foundation, and the appellate power of the Supreme Court should be made in respect to that class of cases entirely easy and accessible to all. It should be retained upon different grounds and not limited by the specific amount which may be involved in the given case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

The question being put, a division was called for.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask for the yeas and nays, the Senate is so thin; I would not take the question otherwise.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I am a member of the committee that reported this bill, wherein the question was very much debated. It is perfectly clear that there are questions of fact in patent suits which are used as test cases, in which the amount immediately involved in the action is comparatively small, but the settlement of the principle upon which the amount is allowed reaches to an enormous amount, a most important sum. Very frequently the settlement of a single case of contested patent results in preventing a wide class of litigation.

Wherever you can test the principle and settle it clearly in a patent case, there is consent; acquiescence follows, and litigation is prevented. The principle can be tested just as well, and perhaps with more safety, where the amount involved is small, than where it is great; but whether the amount in the individual case is great or small is not so important as it is that the principle upon which that patent is contested, or its claim rests which may extend to a principle of patent law, (speaking generically of patent law, not restricted to the identical case,) should be settled if naturally its application would be expanded to a great class of cases in amount, and you can prevent litigation by allowing a single case to decide the whole of that family of cases. There it is obviously wise and proper, and in accordance with sound public policy that it should be done. If an interappellate court, a court which is not the court of final resort, upon which the public mind rests perhaps with less satisfaction as to its decrees, is to be reached and the case stopped there, then you will certainly have multiplicity of suits, a thing to be avoided and in no case to be desired.

It was for that reason, it is proper I should say, that I in the committee approved rather of the words which have been canceled in the bill as printed than the words which are here printed in Italics. The majority of the committee thought otherwise and the bill was reported as it stands. I remain of the opinion that in actions on patent rights and copyrights, presenting a single case where a principle may be settled for the whole family of cases connected with the patent, upon a certification by the interappellate court that the question involved is of sufficient importance to render it proper that a final decision thereof should be made by the Supreme Court, the Supreme Court ought to have cognizance and the appeal or the writ of error ought to lie to it.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator understand that that is not the case in the bill under the amendment proposed by the committee?

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, I understand that it is even broader in the amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator does not quite understand me. He states that he thinks, irrespective of value, the question of the validity of a patent right ought to be made the subject, under certain circumstances, of review by the Supreme Court.

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, the principle of the case.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator understand that that is not the case in the bill now?

Mr. BAYARD. I understand that as the law now stands any such case can go up without the certification of a court; that in copyright cases and patent cases there is an exclusion of the disability arising from a small amount involved in the controversy.

Mr. INGALLS. Then how is the [illegible] obnoxious to the Senator's criticism?

Mr. BAYARD. For the reason that the clause which was stricken out gave the interappellate court a control over that question, and did not allow a small case, what I may call a petty case, of contested patent to be set before the Supreme Court. The object of the bill is to interpose this interappellate court as a kind of sieve, so to speak, so as to catch all the cases that are not over $10,000 in amount; but where contested questions of patent are heard which may affect either a principle applied to the family of cases affected by that patent or the principle of patent law that would run through the whole system of the adjudication of patents, then the court, no matter what may be the amount, shall in their discretion certify to the Supreme Court, I will not say the case but the principle involved in the case, for the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. I prefer that that discretion of the court as to the importance of the case shall apply, because I think we should not open this floodgate, so to speak, of copyright and patent cases which the present status of the law allows. As the bill was originally printed, no patent case, no copyright case, which did not involve $10,000, could be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States. I propose that that should be to some degree remedied, and wherever in the opinion of the interappellate court a principle is involved of sufficient importance in the opinion of the court to justify its removal to the Supreme Court for final decision, they shall have the right to do it.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him one moment there?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask the Senator's attention to the provision upon page 9 of the bill, commencing in line 13, which is in these words:

Or where the court shall certify that the adjudication involves a legal question of sufficient importance to require that the final decision thereof should be made by the Supreme Court.

Under that provision is it not apparent that if the legal question is of sufficient importance, a patent-right case or a copyright case can go up like any other, irrespective of the question of value?

Mr. BAYARD. I have no doubt that is true. I supposed the object of the language on page 9 was from excess of caution directly to repeal more than it implied, the present language of the statute which exempts cases of copyright and patent right expressly from limitation as to amounts. The law as it now stands in the Revised Statutes allows a case of copyright or of patent right, regardless of amount, to pass to the Supreme Court upon appeal or by writ of error. It is intended to put a sieve, as I said before, upon cases of a certain pecuniary magnitude, and I suppose that the repetition of that language is meant expressly to repeal the existing provisions of law respecting copyright and patent-right cases, and to subject them to the discretion of the court and the discrimination of the court so that such cases alone shall pass up under $10,000 in amount as the court shall certify to the Supreme Court to obtain the decision of the Supreme Court upon.

That is my understanding, and I confess that it should be so, because there may be cases of copyright and there may be cases of patent right which involve nothing on earth except the sum of money in question, involving no principle at all, being a mere contestation over a set of facts or some mere construction of a statute or of patent rights unimportant in principle. With a desire to relieve the Supreme Court from the burden of accumulated work growing out of just such cases as that, cases unimportant in principle and unimportant in amount, we provide now that cases that are over a given amount, that is to say $10,000, shall go to the Supreme Court, and that cases important in principle shall go there also in the discretion of the court of appeals. That is the reason why I prefer that the language which has been canceled should remain in and that the language in Italics should be stricken out. I shall vote against the amendment in Italics, which is the question now before the Senate, and shall vote in favor of the restoration of the language which has been canceled.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I shall be brief, for I do not desire to occupy the attention of the Senate any more than is necessary upon this question; but it seems to me that the original bill went far enough in the matter of limiting or changing the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in patent and copyright cases. Practically the bill as it stood would take away from the Supreme Court of the United States all patent and all copyright cases, except those few cases in which it should be certified that a question was involved of sufficient importance to render it proper for the final decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. BAYARD. That would be a repeal by implication, but not very positive implication.

Mr. PLATT. But I think that would be the construction if the language were not stricken out as proposed.

Mr. BAYARD. The language which follows on page 10 would not interfere with that interpretation, but would simply affirm it.

Mr. PLATT. I am now speaking of the language on page 10. By the present law an appeal is allowed in equity cases to the Supreme Court of the United States in relation to patent rights and copyrights. That appeal takes up both the law and the fact. But the bill as it stood before the amendment was proposed by the committee would divest the Supreme Court of the United States of its final jurisdiction in all that class of cases, so far as facts were concerned, unless the court of appeals should in those cases certify that a question was involved of sufficient importance for the adjudication of the Supreme Court. The bill as it stood before the amendment was proposed did in a very great degree have the effect of relieving the Supreme Court of the United States from all patent-right and copyright cases, and only left the provision that where a question of sufficient importance was, in the opinion of the inferior court, involved, so that it ought to be decided by the Supreme Court, that case might be sent there. It does seem to me that that was going far enough.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill contemplates two cases in which appeals may reach the Supreme Court; one in which the amount involved exceeds $10,000, and the other in which a point of law is of sufficient magnitude in the opinion of the court below to justify certification. I wish to place patent and copyrights on exactly the same plane in regard to those two points as every other species of property. Those who agree with me will vote in favor of sustaining the amendment offered by the committee.

Mr. HOAR. I wish merely to say in one word I do not propose to make any question about this amendment, but I think it ought to be stated, after the two brief speeches of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] that it would be impossible to put a patent or copyright in the same condition with any other species of property. It differs in its very nature, because when an inventor brings a suit against a Massachusetts man of course it can be determined there, but his patent right is the subject of attacks all over the country; when one infringement is put down twenty more spring up in all parts of the country, in other districts.

It seems to me, therefore, that it is very reasonable there should be some means by which a tribunal whose judgment is final for the whole country should be the tribunal to decide upon the validity of the patent right. We have case after case, as I said before, where for the whole period of fourteen years and seven years under the old law, for the whole period of seventeen years now, a patent which is clearly the property of the inventor is made useless and the inventor ruined by combinations of infringers all over the country.

But at the same time I propose to submit myself to the judgment of the majority of the committee, of which the Senator from Kansas is one, and will not attempt to interfere with the frame-work of the bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I do not care particularly about the pending amendment. I shall vote against the bill; and I think this is as proper a time for me to make the announcement of that purpose as any that will arrive.

The bill is based upon the idea that the Supreme Court is overcrowded with work and that something must be done to relieve the court of the burden. I have no doubt it is true that there is a very large docket in the Supreme Court, and that litigants will be put to very great inconvenience providing the present condition of affairs continues; but I am not clear that this bill provides the best means by which to relieve the Supreme Court and the litigants therein. In my opinion, some other plan might be devised which would not be so cumbrous as that included in this bill, whereby the evil complained of might be remedied.

This bill proposes to increase the Federal judiciary by adding eighteen circuit judges. It occurs to me that there is a sufficient number of Federal judges in the country to-day to do all the business which ought to go to the courts. I do not know exactly what plan might be formulated to utilize the services of the circuit and district judges in connection with the judges of the Supreme Court whereby the present business that now reaches the Supreme Court might be lessened, but I am very well satisfied that a bill may be properly framed to devolve many duties that now pertain to the Supreme Court upon an intermediate court composed exclusively of circuit and district judges without any increase whatever of the Federal judiciary.

I wish to be frank, and I will state here frankly one other objection that I have to the pending bill. So far as I know there is not to-day a single circuit judge in the United States, but one judge of the Supreme Court, and but very few district judges but what are members of the same political party, and if this bill passes an addition of eighteen judges of the same political faith will be placed to try the issues that will come up from the country before these courts. I do not believe, while that is the case, that the decisions of those courts can or ought to command the respect which the judges of the Federal judiciary, if divided between the political parties, ought to command.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator from Delaware assume that all these appointments will be made from one political party?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do so assume; and I think I have abundant reasons so to conclude. There have been judges nominated for the Supreme Court during the present session belonging to the political faith of the Senator from Iowa. I do not suppose any one anticipated that any but judges of that faith would be nominated; and I heard no objection to it from the Senator from Iowa or any one on that side of the Chamber. Whatever may be the virtues of the present Executive, I apprehend that he is as much of a partisan as other Presidents who have preceded him and will appoint from his own party these eighteen additional judges.

When such a court has to try quasi-political questions growing out of the amendments to the Constitution and the legislation of Congress soon after the war based upon the amendments of the Constitution, however honest they may be, I do not believe its members can avoid having their judgments to some extent affected by their preconceived notions upon the political questions which will necessarily come before them. Not believing that they can divest themselves of their prejudices, I honestly believe that the court in its composition ought to be divided between the great parties of the country.

While I would not have any judge carry his political prejudices upon the bench, yet knowing the infirmities of humanity, and knowing that it is done to a greater or less extent, I am unwilling to see the Federal judiciary increased unless there can be some partition of power on the bench between the respective parties of this country. I shall for this reason, as well as others, vote against this bill.

I believe that if the Committee on the Judiciary would go to work again it might, out of the present number of district, circuit, and Supreme Court judges, constitute an intermediate appellate court which would relieve the Supreme Court of part of the duties which now devolve upon it. The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court might be restricted in some respects at any rate. There are classes of cases that go to the Supreme Court when there is no special reason that they should go there. Take, for instance, suits brought by national banks, which can take every question arising in which they are interested to the Federal courts. The national banks of any State, instead of suing in the State courts, may now if so disposed sue in the Federal courts. If you would change the national banking law so as to compel them to sue in the State courts of the State where they are located instead of the Federal courts you would to that extent relieve the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and the pressure upon it. I think there might be such a revision of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court as to take away from it some of the duties which now pertain to it without increasing the Federal judiciary. If this, however, is not advisable, an intermediate appellate court might be constituted out of the present circuit and district judges. This is all I desire to say on the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] on this amendment. If he were here, he would vote for it, and I should vote against it.

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.] I do not know how he would vote upon this particular amendment.

Mr. VAN WYCK, (when the name of Mr. SAUNDERS was called.) I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. SAUNDERS] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. FAIR. I am paired with my colleague, the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I inadvertently voted. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.] I withdraw my vote.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Acting Secretary read the next amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, which was, in section 10, [11,] after the word "law," in line 46, to strike out "Provided, That."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, line 50, after the word "may," to insert "within one year next after the proof of the will or appointment of the administrator, or within one year next after the death of the ancestor in the case of an heir;" so as to read:

If, within the year after the entry of the judgment or the decree sought to be reversed, any party shall die, the personal representative or heir, as the case may require, may, within one year next after the proof of the will or appointment of the administrator, or within one year next after the death of the ancestor in the case of an heir, sue out or be made a party to, a writ of error, or take an appeal, or be made a party thereto, without reviving the judgment or decree in the court in which the same was entered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 11, [12,] line 3, after the word "upon," to strike out "the certificate of the clerk of the court" and insert "his written certificate;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 11. That any district judge who, in pursuance of the provisions of this act, shall attend the court of appeals held at any place other than where he resides, shall, upon his written certificate, be paid by the marshal of the district in which the court shall be held his reasonable expenses for travel and attendance, not to exceed $10 per day, and such payment shall be allowed the marshal in the settlement of his accounts with the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 12, [13,] before the word "designated," in line 6, to insert "previously;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 12. That appeals taken and writs of error sued out from a decree or a judgment of the supreme court of any Territory entered after the said 1st day of September, shall be taken and sued out as provided by this act, and shall lie to the court of appeals sitting in such circuit as shall be previously designated by a general order of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 13, [14,] line 4, after the word "jurisdiction," to insert "and shall perform the same duties;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 13. That there shall be appointed for each circuit, by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two additional circuit judges, who shall have the same powers and jurisdiction, and shall perform the same duties, and be entitled to the same compensation, as the circuit judge appointed under existing laws.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 14, [15,] line 1, after the word "district," to strike out the words "the circuit judge who is senior in office shall appoint the clerk of;" in line 2, after the word "court," to insert "shall appoint the clerk thereof;" and in line 3, after the word "thereof," to strike out "and shall designate in what districts of the circuit the circuit judges shall, from time to time, hold the circuit court;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 14. That in each district the circuit court shall appoint the clerk thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the end of section 14 [15,] to add:

And the circuit judges of said circuit shall, as a body, determine, from time to time, which of them shall hold the circuit court in the respective districts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out section 16, in the following words:

SEC. 16. That when, from the accumulation of business in the court of appeals, in any circuit, the administration of justice therein is unduly delayed, it shall be the duty of such court to certify the facts, under the seal of the court, to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court may thereupon make an order transferring a portion of the causes pending in such court of appeals to one or more of the courts of appeals of other circuits where such accumulation of business does not exist, and each of the courts of appeals of such other circuits shall thereupon hear and determine such causes in like manner, and with the like effect, and in the same order as if the causes so transferred had originated in its own circuit.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out section 17, in the following words:

SEC. 17. That this act shall take effect on the —— day of ——, 188-.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to offer an amendment to which I suppose there will be no objection. At the end of section 10, after the word "entered," I move to insert:

But appeals taken and writs of error sued out to the Supreme Court under existing laws before the passage hereof shall not be affected by this act.

The purpose of the amendment is that appeals now taken on writs of error to the Supreme Court until this measure becomes a law, if it should ever become a law, may still have their place on the Supreme Court docket and shall not be dismissed. On looking again this morning at the decision of the court in the celebrated McArdle case, I have very grave doubts whether the phraseology of the bill now would leave those cases protected in the Supreme Court; in other words, if they did not amount to $10,000, nor come under the other conditions of this bill, they might be dismissed, notwithstanding the appeal would be regular under the existing law. I therefore offer the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. There can be no objection to it. I thought it was provided for in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In the first line of section 11 I move to strike out the word "district" before "judge." I think where judges attend the appellate courts at different places from where they reside they ought to be allowed the mileage and per diem provided for in the eleventh section. I do not think the provision ought to be confined to the district judges, as it is now.

Mr. INGALLS. I see no objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. INGALLS. It is simply to make the provision for the payment of mileage and expenses applicable to all judges, whether of district or circuit courts.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it is a just provision, and ought to apply to all the judges.

Mr. GARLAND. I do not suppose there is any particular objection to the amendment. The proposition was considered, and it turned upon one point. A district judge has a very limited salary, $3,500 generally, while a circuit judge receives $6,000. That was really the reason which controlled us. There are some very distinguished judges, however, who have been writing here that the word "district" should be stricken out, and I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND. There are some amendments to be offered by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] and also by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.]

Mr. BAYARD. It had better be understood that the right to offer amendments is retained in the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why not offer them as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. BAYARD. Let the right be reserved that they may be voted upon in the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The amendments referred to by the Senator from Arkansas have been printed and are at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not care to ask a second vote upon any amendments now at the desk; I merely desire to be certain that the substitute offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] may not be excluded from consideration. I do not mean to say that I shall approve it, but the substitute has just been printed, and as it involves a great deal, I am inclined to examine it before I vote upon it.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator from Delaware is mistaken about the substitute having just been printed. It was printed long ago. It was before the committee for four months, and was considered in connection with this bill.

Mr. BAYARD. It was never brought to my attention there, and I was not aware that it was ever discussed in committee. I need not disclose what passed in committee, but I was not aware that it was discussed there at all.

Mr. JONAS. I wish to offer a substitute for the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It seems to me that the substitute offered by the Senator from Alabama yesterday should be considered after the text of the bill is perfected. He is not here now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] offers an amendment, which will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and to insert:

That the first section of the act of Congress entitled "An act to determine the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States and to regulate the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1875, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That the circuit courts of the United States shall have original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several States, of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of $500, and arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority, or in which the United States are plaintiffs or petitioners, or in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different States or a controversy between citizens of the same States claiming lands under grants of different States, or a controversy between citizens of a State and foreign states, citizens or subjects; and shall have exclusive cognizance of all crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States, except as otherwise provided by law, and concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the crimes and offenses cognizable therein. But no person shall be arrested in one district for trial in another in any civil action before a circuit or district court. And no civil suit shall be brought before either of said courts against any person by any original process or proceeding in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving such process or commencing such proceeding, except as hereinafter provided; nor shall any circuit or district court have cognizance of any suit founded on contract in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover thereon if no assignment had been made. And the circuit courts shall also have appellate jurisdiction from the district courts under the regulations and restrictions prescribed by law."

SEC. 2. That the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for the removal of causes in certain cases from State courts,' approved July 27, 1866," which was approved March 2, 1867, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 3. That the circuit courts of the United States shall have the power to issue writs of mandamus to Federal officers to compel the performance of duties prescribed by law, but shall have no original jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus in any other cases whatsoever.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] is now in his seat, and as a mere way of orderly business, his amendments would come in properly before that of the Senator from Louisiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Any amendment proposing to perfect the part proposed to be stricken out is in order, and will take precedence. The first amendment of the Senator from South Carolina will be reported.

The ACTING SECRETARY. At the end of section 3, it is proposed to add:

The circuit judges (the present incumbents in office and those to be appointed under this act) shall succeed each other in rotation on the court of appeals herein provided for, in the nine circuits as now organized; and the Supreme Court of the United States shall make the necessary rules and regulations to effectuate such rotation; but no circuit judge shall serve longer than twelve months consecutively in any circuit.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall not detain the Senate by any remarks upon my amendment. I shall simply ask for a yea-and-nay vote if I can succeed in getting a second.

I had two objects in view in presenting the amendment. One was to make the system more effective, and the second was to enable certain localities in this country to get rid, temporarily at least, of very unworthy judges. I am very frank to make that admission. The circuit judge of the circuit in which I live is, in my opinion, utterly unfit to discharge the duties that he is now discharging, and I can never by my vote consent to give his court additional power unless there is a prospect of getting rid of him and having his presence certainly not more than once in nine years.

In addition to that, I believe that the amendment which I have offered would give efficacy to the whole scheme of the bill and improve it. I shall, therefore, do no more than ask for the yeas and nays upon my amendment.

Mr. GARLAND. I will state the theory upon which this bill is predicated, so far as it is intended to be of real service to the country. These courts are to be localized and brought home to the bosom and to the business of the people. The circuit judges who are to hold these courts now exist to some extent, and it is intended by the bill that the courts shall be held to a particular locality so that the judges may familiarize themselves with the jurisprudence, the law, and the whole judicial policy of that particular section of country.

It is not worth while to send a judge in Texas familiar with the laws there up to Maine to acquaint himself with a new system of laws altogether, to preside in the courts, nor would it be worth while to send a New York judge, to sever him entirely from the jurisprudence which he was acquainted with, to South Carolina to learn law.

This question was debated once in the Senate very ably upon a bill that Mr. A. P. Butler, then a Senator from South Carolina, introduced to remodel the whole judicial system. Mr. Douglas introduced a substitute, in many of its features like the bill we now have under consideration, and he had a section in that bill to alternate the Supreme Court judges; there were no circuit judges then. He argued with his usual ability, and his argument is presented on page 194 of the volume of the Congressional Globe which I have in my hand; but the vote of the Senate was against him decidedly at that time, the main bill being supported by Senator Butler as reported from the committee by him. There were strong reasons for alternating the Supreme Court judges, which do not exist for alternating the circuit judges under this bill, because they would go out to bring back annually their law to decide upon general cases that were brought here from all parts of the Union; whereas these circuit judges are intended for a good purpose, simply to preside over the particular judicial system where they live.

I sympathize, from my heart, with the Senator from South Carolina, as well as the Senator from Alabama, who addressed the Senate yesterday, in their desire to get rid of bad judges, but I do not know when we shall ever do that. If the Senator from South Carolina will reflect that we get an additional force upon such a judge there to hold him in check or to review or to examine his acts, he will see that with that addition he has a safeguard which he did not have before.

As a matter of course, when it is said that we may have just such judges appointed, that is something on which I have no authority to speak, something I know nothing about, but those are the chances we have to take in a republican form of government, where the appointing power is vested in a President elected by the people. I think upon the original proposition the reason is not a good one for alternating these judges.

Mr. BUTLER. I was not aware of the proceedings had to which the Senator from Arkansas refers. I did not know that a bill had been introduced like this or an amendment like mine on a previous occasion, and I have not read the arguments of the very distinguished Senators to whom he refers.

The Senator from Arkansas says it would be unwise and injudicious to transfer a judge from Texas to Maine to learn law. It seems to me that a judge who is appointed to this high position ought to be informed of the laws of this country before he is appointed. He is not put upon the bench to study law or to learn law. This is essentially a Federal system, and I believe that it would conduce very much to the efficacy of this appeal court if it could be made migratory and transferred from one circuit to another. Believing that it would improve its efficiency, I have introduced in perfect good faith this amendment to require the judges to be transferred from one circuit to another, under rules and regulations to be provided by the Supreme Court of the United States. The idea which I had of getting rid of incompetent, worthless, and infamous judges was an incident, and, I confess, a very strong one, because I see no way of getting rid of them otherwise.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] in illustrating his argument yesterday pointed to the performances of a judge in that circuit which are simply disgraceful. I think I shall be able to demonstrate at the proper time that similar performances have been made by a judge in the circuit in which I live, and that proceedings are now being had there which are simply disgraceful to American liberty and American citizenship.

Therefore, while that is one of the objects of my amendment, the primary controlling influence was that in my opinion it would improve this bill by having the amendment in it.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not know what are the particular acts of the judge in South Carolina of which the Senator from that State complains as being a disgrace to justice, but I suppose he alludes to the rulings in connection with the election cases in that State, which, if the testimony that is disclosed is true, are a much greater disgrace to justice and to liberty than has ever before been perpetrated on this continent. If that is what the Senator bases his argument upon why his amendment should prevail, I submit that it must fall.

Every lawyer is aware that different systems of law and practice prevail in the different States in the Union, and the courts of the United States are bound to follow, as far as possible, the practice in the different States in the decision of causes that arise before them. In Louisiana and in some other Southern States we have the civil practice; in others the common law prevails; in the Western States and in New York we have a codified system of laws.

The object in localizing these courts under the bill that is reported by the committee is to secure an efficient, vigorous, and prompt administration of justice by a court that is familiarized by observation and practice with the laws that there prevail. If this court is to be put on wheels and made peripatetic and migratory, so that after having become familiar with the laws of one section of the country or one circuit the judges are to be sent off to become familiarized with the laws of a section which has entirely different systems of procedure, the advantages to result from a localized system of administration would be entirely lost.

I hope the Senate will understand that the object that is avowed by the Senator from South Carolina in advocating his amendment is to avoid the administration of one judge who is obnoxious to the people of his State. If that is a sufficient reason, it may be said, as was stated by the Senator from Arkansas, that two judges are to be added to the court in that district, so that if the judge is as obnoxious as the Senator states he will be in a minority, no matter what class of cases may come before him.

Mr. BUTLER. I only desire to make a response to one remark made by the Senator from Kansas. He says he does not know of what I complain unless it is something that is transpiring in the election trials in Charleston. The Senator, as a matter of course, now, as upon all occasions, knows very much more about those trials and about what is being done there than I do. I acknowledge that. I acknowledge the supremacy and the superiority of his information and ability upon those questions; but I think I shall be able to demonstrate to him and to the Senate at the proper time—and this is not the proper time—that a certain circuit judge of the United States has been guilty of conduct that is disgraceful to American jurisprudence, the opinion of the Senator to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask if the Senator did not refer to Judge Bond?

Mr. BUTLER. I did, sir. He is the judge to whom I referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONAS, (when his name was called.) On this amendment I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) On this amendment I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PUGH, (when Mr. SAULSBURY'S name was called.) The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] requested me to state that he is paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. KELLOGG, (after having voted in the negative.) I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—17.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] proposes to offer a second amendment, which will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add as an additional section:

SEC. 16. That after the establishment of the courts of appeals herein provided for there shall be no additional appointments to the Supreme Court of the United States until the number of said Supreme Court shall be reduced to six members.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to offer another amendment. At the end of section 8 of the bill I move to add:

And no criminal case or cases shall be begun or instituted in any United States court by information, except revenue cases and cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; but all criminal cases in said courts, save those excepted above, shall be instituted and prosecuted in said courts by indictment on the presentment of a grand jury duly drawn and regularly impaneled according to law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CONGER, (when Mr. FERRY'S name was called.) I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. FERRY] is paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] I make this announcement for all the votes to-day.

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this amendment with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ROLLINS. I am paired on political questions with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.] His colleague [Mr. CALL] thinks this is a political question, and therefore I decline to vote.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bayard,	Coke,	Hampton,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	Pugh,
Butler,	Farley,	Jackson,	Slater,

Garland,	Kellogg,	Rollins,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment is proposed by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. VEST,] which will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. At the end of section 3 it is moved to add:

Provided, That no circuit or district judge before whom a cause or question may have been tried or heard in the district court shall sit on the trial or hearing of such cause or question in the court hereby created; and the places of such judge or judges so disqualified shall be filled by the other judges then present, as hereinbefore provided in cases of absence.

The question being put, the Chair declared that the "noes" appeared to prevail.

Mr. VEST. Do I understand the committee to object to that amendment.

Mr. GARLAND. The committee does not. I am in favor of it so far as I am concerned. It is a principle for which I have been contending for some time, and have been trying to ingraft on this bill.

Mr. VEST. I hardly think there can be serious objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator demand a division?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir; and I want to make a statement in regard to it. I hold and have always held as a lawyer that an appellate court means a new court; that an appellate tribunal is a tribunal created for the purpose of reviewing the proceedings of the court below, in order to correct its errors or to examine its judgment with an unbiased, with an uninfluenced opinion. Every lawyer who has ever tried a cause before a nisi prius judge, who afterward sits in banc on the same case, knows that he tries it in the latter court before a man who must rise above the pride of opinion, or else he becomes an advocate for his own opinion against the counsel that pleads before him. I undertake to say—and I believe the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] in front of me now will corroborate my opinion—that in not one case out of a thousand was a judge ever found, no matter how distinguished, who, sitting in banc, was in favor of reversing his own judgment delivered in a nisi prius court.

I speak with some experience on this question, because in my own State just after the war, about 1867 or 1868, in order to relieve the supreme court of Missouri of a press of business similar to that from which it is now sought to relieve the justices of the United States Supreme Court, we organized, copying the New York practice, what was known as the district court, an intermediate court between the circuit courts of the State and the supreme court. Under that organization five circuit court judges constituted the district court in each district, and they sat in banc upon the decisions which had been rendered in those five circuits. The result was that the circuit judge who delivered the opinion in the court below invariably became the counsel and advocate for his opinion when he presided in the district court, and he answered the counsel who tried the same case before him below from the bench; and when the judges went into the consultation-room in an ex parte proceeding he had it all his own way; in his pride of opinion, and honestly perhaps, he impressed upon the other judges the necessity of affirming the judgment rendered before him. The result was that ninety-nine cases out of one hundred were affirmed. The further result was that the court was almost unanimously done away with very soon.

I say now that in the Supreme Court of the United States this defect exists, and every lawyer knows it. Take an associate justice of the Supreme Court who tries a case on the circuit; let it come to the Supreme Court afterward, and the comity of the court, to use the expression of "comity" between judges, gives his opinion an undue influence. I do not mean corruptly; but I mean to say that in the absence of counsel in the consultation-room, in the argument of the judges before the opinion, the judicial comity causes the opinion of that judge nearly always to prevail. I have heard it stated by a distinguished Supreme Court judge, stated to me, that in twenty-odd years upon the Supreme Bench he never knew a judge but in two cases to reverse his own opinion.

As public men we can see the almost irresistible tendency of this sort of practice to destroy in an appellate court just exactly what the law contemplates, and that is a trial de novo, a trial before judges who look at the record unbiased and who can therefore correct the errors, if any have been committed by their associates. But put the same man there and what does he do? He says, "that is my opinion; I am correct," and the other judges yield to him, and I say because out of courtesy and comity he is there as counsel and advocate. For that reason I hold that this amendment is proper; and I cannot vote for this bill unless some such amendment is incorporated in it.

I will add another thing before sitting down. The practice that prevails now of allowing the nisi prius judge to sit in banc on a case is destructive absolutely to young lawyers and to modest lawyers. I do not mention this as having a personal application, because there never was any degree of modesty that was my characteristic. I therefore do not complain from any personal experience; but take a young man and a modest man and let him go to a court in banc to argue for the reversal of a judgment rendered by one of the judges, and I will not say he is afraid, but he is unwilling to attack that judgment in the presence of the judge who rendered it. To a certain extent he is overawed in the Supreme Court or in the court of appeals by the presence of the very judge clothed with the judicial ermine who is there to defend the opinion previously rendered and antagonize him at every step. That does not apply to old practitioners; but I have seen young men in a court in banc who absolutely lost their cases because, as they told me afterward, "Well, I did not want to attack the judge and make him mad, and have him argue the case afterward in the consultation-room, and therefore I left so much out of my argument."

The whole system is wrong, vicious, and it ought to be done away with.

I ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

Mr. HALE. I certainly hope, Mr. President, that this amendment will not be adopted. All of my experience and all of my theory about judges differ from that of the Senator from Missouri. To me it is plain that any man who is competent and fitted to be a judge is fitted and competent to sit in review over his own decision. I cannot conceive that any man of prominence and eminence enough at the bar to be appointed either to a circuit judgeship or a district judgeship of the United States can be in any way influenced by such considerations as have been presented by the Senator from Missouri. A judge must live and learn as any other man; and if he is fitted to pass first upon a case, surely he is fitted, on association and conference with his brethren of the bench, to revise his opinion.

In my own State we have tried this for years. The judges of our supreme court, the highest court in Maine, hold the term at nisi prius, pass upon all questions of law arising at the trial, admit and exclude evidence, and exceptions are taken to their decisions and certified to the court sitting as a whole court, and all the judges participate in the conference and in the final decision; and it is no unwonted thing in the State of Maine for a judge who has heard a case at nisi prius, who has made a ruling from which exceptions have been taken, in the upper court to be intrusted with rendering the decision overruling the law as he had laid it down in the lower court. Anybody who will peruse the Maine reports will find that this is by no means a rare instance.

I say again that I cannot conceive that a man of the dignity and loftiness of character competent to hold one of these high judicial positions would feel afterward that on conference with his brethren he ought to maintain what was his own opinion, and thus in fact represent one side of the case; and the information and the knowledge of law that he carries to the conference of the upper court from having passed through one trial of the questions involved, to me make him more valuable as an associate.

So I hope this amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, my experience, which has not been a very small one, agrees entirely with that of the Senator from Maine. I do not believe that in the supreme court of Massachusetts I ever detected any sign that a judge who had tried a case at nisi prius was affected in the decision of the case when he sat with his associates in banc. There are numerous instances, in fact it is not uncommon, when a decision of a judge is overruled in our State, to commit the preparation of the opinion to the judge whose decision at nisi prius was overruled, if he concur with his brethren.

I remember one remarkable instance in regard to a law which very much excited the feelings of a very large portion of our citizens, the law known as the Maine liquor law, where that law declared that a stock of liquor kept for sale contrary to law should be a nuisance, and thereupon certain citizens, under the assumed common-law right of every citizen to abate a common nuisance, met together and destroyed the stock of a liquor seller. Chief-Justice Shaw at nisi prius held in a suit brought by the liquor seller against the wrongdoers that that statute made that act lawful. Afterward the case was argued with a vigor and pungency of argument rarely equaled, before the bench over which that great magistrate presided, and he himself gave a masterly judgment overruling his own decision.

I think in our statutes with regard to the judiciary, as I said the other day, we should assume that the judges are great men, wise men, learned men, men free from small and petty prejudices and small motives; and that assumption tends in itself to preserve and elevate the judicial character. The judge on the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States goes into the presence, when he goes into the consultation room, of eight men, chosen from among the ablest and purest and greatest jurists and citizens of the Republic. He desires to maintain his judicial character and his judicial fame, not only with the public at large but with the men with whose presence he decides these causes when the doors are closed; and that would be a very reckless man who should present himself to the eight men, with whom his life is to be passed and in whose estimation he would desire to stand high, in the attitude of an angry, earnest, unfair partisan of an opinion merely because in the necessary haste of a trial at nisi prius he had ruled one way or the other.

I entirely concur with the position so clearly stated by the Senator from Maine, and the result is that in every trial, if this proposition is carried out with reference to the Supreme Court of the United States and to these courts, you are likely to deprive the tribunal of the benefit of the opinion and of the aid in consultation perhaps of the very greatest judge who sits upon the case—a law question, a principle of great, permanent, far-reaching public consequence to be decided, not for the case but for every like case. You disqualify perhaps the ablest judge upon the bench merely because the question happened to be presented to him in the first instance for a nisi prius ruling.

Just think, Mr. President, of excluding from the history of the United States the great opinions of Chief-Justice Marshall in McCulloch vs. Maryland, or in the Dartmouth College case, or in Gibbons vs. Ogden, because it happened that that question had been first brought before him for a pro forma ruling at nisi prius. I think the gentlemen on the other side of the House, I think my honorable friend from Missouri would be very sorry to strike out from the jurisprudence of this country some of the great judgments of Chief-Justice Taney if they happened to come up from the central circuit of this country where that judge was holding the circuit court.

If the judge goes into consultation with a pride of opinion and manifesting an undue zeal, that very fact weakens rather than strengthens the weight which he will have with his associates in the consultation, and the court can be trusted to take care of the matter and prevent any injustice.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, the Judiciary Committee cannot properly object to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. I would propose to him that the latter clause of the amendment should be changed. The word "circuit" should be inserted before "district."

Mr. VEST. I have no objection.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Judiciary Committee acted on this subject in reference to a bill for the Supreme Court of the United States. I do not know whether it was a unanimous opinion or not. The bill was up the other day, when the Senator from Massachusetts opposed it under the Anthony rule; it passed over under an objection, and could not be considered under the Anthony rule. That bill, reported by the Senator from Arkansas, provided that no judge of the Supreme Court who had tried a cause below should sit in that cause in the Supreme Court. There is a difference of opinion in the bar of this country in relation to this subject. Many of them are very earnestly opposed to an appellate judge sitting on a case which he himself has once tried. They say that the infirmity of human nature is such that, great man though he be, he is exceedingly anxious to maintain the judgment which he was instrumental in giving in the court below. I think that in the region of country from which I come the sentiment is very strong against a judge of an appellate court deciding a cause, and not only deciding it, but participating in the hearing of it, having anything to do with it if he decided it below; that the appellate tribunal ought to be an entire body that never heard the question at all. On the contrary, there are many lawyers who believe that the judge who tried the cause ought to be in the appellate court to give the benefit of his counsel and advice to the judges who are to decide it there with him.

As I said before, I do not think that the Judiciary Committee who reported this bill can object to this amendment of the Senator from Missouri in consequence of the action that was taken in reference to the Supreme Court, because if the different judges of the Supreme Court should not sit in any case that they tried below, the circuit judges and district judges should not sit in the intermediate appellate court in any case that they tried below.

I have thought proper to say this much for the Judiciary Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Illinois please state so that the Secretary may get the exact modification in the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I send the modification to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as modified will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. After the word "district," in line 3 of the amendment, it is proposed to insert "or circuit;" in line 4, before the word "court," to insert "appellate;" and to strike out from line 4 to the end of the proviso; so that the whole amendment will read:

Provided, That no circuit or district judge before whom a cause or question may have been tried or heard in the district or circuit court shall sit on the trial or hearing of such cause or question in the appellate court.

Mr. ALLISON. Is the remainder struck out?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Yes, sir; there is no necessity for it.

Mr. PLATT. I presume that the opinion of Senators on this question is very likely to follow the practice in their own States. In the State of Connecticut it is now provided by statute that no judge shall sit to revise a decision which he has made on the circuit. That has been the statute law in Connecticut for a long time, and it was the practice before that. In our earliest reports, when the names of great judges like Sherman and Baldwin, and later Ellsworth, appeared, you will find at the close of the decisions, "Sherman, J., did not sit, having tried the case in the court below." It has been our practice, I think, ever since the foundation of our courts, and we like it.

Now, I do not propose to enter into the question as to whether a judge should be trusted or not. That is not the question, but it is that there shall be upon every court of last resort judges who have not formed an opinion in the case before they hear it. I think that is right, and so thinking, I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, upon which he has asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, this amendment proposes a very radical change in the practice of the United States courts, and there ought to be a very good and substantial reason for its adoption before we adopt it. It contains an imputation against the members of the Supreme Court of the United States, who have from the foundation of the Government participated in the decisions which have been rendered on the circuit, contrary to the rule attempted to be prescribed by this amendment. I have heard no complaint until to-day, either that any member of that tribunal has been improperly influenced in his own judgment, or that he has attempted improperly to influence the judgment of his associates——

Mr. VEST. Does the Senator mean to say that I said any such thing?

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir.

Mr. VEST. He says he never heard it till to-day.

Mr. GEORGE. I understood it to be said that judges did that sort of thing.

Mr. VEST. Improperly? I said judges were simply men like the rest of us.

Mr. GEORGE. I withdraw the word "improperly." I have not heard that there was any disposition on the part of any member of the Supreme Court to influence the decision of his associates and of the court otherwise than by the presentation of proper arguments for their consideration.

The Senator from Massachusetts gives us the experience of his State. The members of the supreme court of that State, as I understood him to say, hold the nisi prius courts, and then in general term each judge sits upon the decision that has been made. I can say this with reference to the decisions of that court, that however they may be brought about, however they may be influenced, the decisions of no court in this Union stand higher with the profession than the decisions of that court.

Again, Mr. President, it has been the practice of the country from which we derive our judicial institutions, England, for five hundred years that the judge who decides a cause at nisi prius should sit in the court in banc when that decision was reviewed. Under that practice a system of common law and of equity law has grown up which is the admiration of the world.

Let us look at the objection as presented by the Senator from Missouri. If I understood him correctly, it is this: that there is a sort of comity between the members of the court which may influence them in reviewing the decision of one of their associates. Does not that feeling of comity exist just as strongly whether the member whose opinion is on review is present or absent? Does it add anything to the reluctance with which the other members of the court would overrule a decision made by one of the court, that he is not permitted to be present and to give his reasons for the opinion or judgment which he had rendered? I think not, sir; and if the judges are so weak, if they have in the consultation room more care for the feelings of their associate, more care for their own reputation than they have for the adjudication of the law as it is, then, sir, the objection will apply just as strongly whether the judge whose opinion is under review be present or absent. So I think there is nothing in that to justify us in departing from a practice which has existed from the foundation of the Government to the present day.

Then, again, as was suggested by some of the Senators who have addressed the Senate on this question, it is to be presumed that the judge who tried a case in the court below has some special information concerning it, some special knowledge of the law or of the facts, which would enable him to decide more intelligently and more correctly than he otherwise would. Ought we to deprive his associates who sit in review of his decision of the benefit, of the advantage of this knowledge and of this information? I think not.

It was suggested, I believe by one of the Senators who has addressed the Senate, that the judges ought to come to the trial of the case without any preconceived notion as to the law applicable to it. That is a very good rule for a juror, but I cannot see how you can apply that rule to a judge, unless you get a judge such as we have had sometimes in late years in the South, who was entirely impartial upon all questions of law simply for the reason that he had no knowledge of any principle of law at all. So I see nothing in that objection.

Now, Mr. President, I have another reason which induces me to vote against this amendment. I understand this amendment is to be a precedent for another bill or for a similar provision to be applied to the Supreme Court of the United States. We have nine judges on that bench. The result will be that in every single case in which is under review the decision of one of the judges we shall have a court composed of only eight members, and therefore liable to be equally divided in its judgment, and thus we shall have no decision at all of the rule of law in controversy. I think that would be an unfortunate result of applying this rule to the Supreme Court.

There is another reason which influences me as a Democrat and as a partisan, and that is this: there is only one member of the Supreme Court who is supposed to entertain opinions on constitutional questions in accord with mine. He has a circuit in which constitutional questions of grave import may originate, and the result will be that when he has decided them on the circuit he will be prevented from participating in the final decision of such causes when they come to the Supreme Court for revision.

For these reasons, sir, I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, as was said by the Senator from Illinois, the amendment of the Senator from Missouri is as old as our system of jurisprudence. In the fourth section of the judiciary act of 1789 it is provided that—

A district judge sitting in a circuit court shall not give a vote in any case of appeal or error from his own decision, but may assign the reasons for such decision.

The founders of our judicial system understood this question as well as we do, I think. They put that provision in the law as applicable to the district judges. I do not see any reason why we should abandon it now; and if it applies to the district judges, I do not see why it should not be as well applicable to the circuit judges. They are all apt very much to be the same kind of men. The district judges, as the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] suggests to me, constitute a part of the circuit court and have for a number of years been permitted to hold the circuit court and sit with judges of the Supreme Court on the circuit bench. I see no reason now for abandoning this principle. If the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, or something like it, should not be adopted, we should repeal this statute, because if we find a district judge on the court of appeals we find him disqualified from sitting on a cause he has decided, while a circuit judge similarly situated would not be disqualified. We shall be compelled to undo what has been done since 1789 unless we adopt the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. It seems to me it ought to be adopted.

Mr. GARLAND. Inasmuch as there is a bill on the Calendar reported by myself from the Committee on the Judiciary on the subject of the Supreme Court judges in relation to this matter, which has been alluded to by the Senator from Mississippi, I wish to say but a very few words.

I am rather of the opinion that it was an oversight in the Committee on the Judiciary not to have the provision contended for by the Senator from Missouri in this bill.

It was certainly an oversight on my part in not attempting to put it on. The idea is not founded as much on the pride of opinion of the judge as it is upon a pure, simple question of justice to the litigant who appeals. When he appeals a case, as he would in this court, to six judges, he opens his case in the appellate court with one of the six against him, and to that extent he is denied a fair trial.

Jurisprudence is the administration of justice according to law. In the best days of the Roman jurisprudence they tried all cases by a formula; that is, under fictitious names. Hence originated that formula in the civil law of Seius vs. Titius, like John Doe against Richard Roe. This is but a symbol at last of the idea of justice being painted blind. An upright judge has nothing in the world to do about knowing the parties in the court below; the less he knows about them the better it is for justice.

This bill proposes six judges to try his case, and he has one to begin with against him. When you impanel a jury to try a man for an alleged crime, you ask each juryman "Have you formed or expressed an opinion about this case?" and here is a judge who goes in to try this case in the last resort who has not only formed an opinion, but has expressed it. I do not care how able he may be, from Marshall down to the smallest man that ever disgraced a bench, it is human nature at least to contend for one's own opinion.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the honorable Senator if he thinks that when the question arose in the Supreme Court of the United States what was the local law of Maine, that principle would apply to the determination of a question where the late Judge Clifford had expressed an opinion?

Mr. GARLAND. Since the Senator has asked me that question, let me say to him this, and I will answer him frankly, as I always attempt to do. I knew Judge Clifford well; I had a very high respect for him, and I respect his memory; but I do believe, if any man would ever fight for his opinion on the Supreme Bench on an appeal from him from the court below, he was the man, and I believe he would die fighting for it if it was necessary. I honor him the more when I think that, because I do not understand, when you ask a man to spend his days and nights on your circuit investigating a thing, and he says the decision is thus and so, you should ask him to reverse it and write himself down an ass because the case goes into a higher tribunal. I say it is to the honor of the man that he should contend for his opinion that he has matured when he has made up his mind on the circuit, after argument of counsel, by investigation.

You ask him to reverse it. Sometimes it is done; but a very attentive reader of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States says the case is very rare where such a thing has happened. It is human nature, whether in a constable or justice of the peace in a township in Arkansas or a judge of the Supreme Bench of the United States; and that is the principle that I contend for, which I should have illustrated a little further the other day but for the objection of the Senator from Massachusetts in reference to the Supreme Court bill.

I repeat that you are putting a man in this high tribunal for the last throw, the last cast of the judicial die, with one man out of six against him. It is not fair, and no human logic can make it fair.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President——

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. MAXEY. I shall only take a few minutes.

The opinion expressed by the Senator from Connecticut that our views on this question are colored by the practice in our own State courts is doubtless true. It is not a question in my judgment of pride of opinion; but if a judge who presides in a court below is honest and capable, his rulings upon the pleadings upon the evidence, as the questions may arise, and upon the law applicable to the case, are the matured, deliberate results and product of his judgment. His charge to the jury is deliberately framed after full argument of counsel. It expresses the convictions of his mind; he has conducted the case according to law.

When that man comes into the court of appeals his opinion is deliberately formed; and it is a part of justice that the judge should be perfectly impartial. It is idle to say that there is that difference between a juryman and a judge that a juryman can be set aside however intelligent he may be, because he has formed an opinion or because he has expressed an opinion, and that a judge is made of so much purer clay that, although he has formed and expressed an opinion, and has done it under the solemnity of an oath, yet that will not affect or color his judgment when he goes into the appellate court.

Mr. President, it is not pride of opinion in the judge that I think the turning point in this case; but if a judge is worthy to wear the ermine he has that respect for the convictions of his mind which caused him to render his judgment as he did render it in the court below that will follow him into any court. That is my judgment.

The Senator from Mississippi says if you exclude the judge who has given the opinion in the circuit court from the Supreme Court, you have eight men left, and you may have a divided court, and thus no result. Suppose you carry that one step further, you have four judges who entertain one view of the question in the Supreme Court, and four judges who take the other; what then do you do? You let the man on the Supreme Bench confirm his own decision. That is what you do. He becomes then the Supreme Court of the United States to affirm the decision which he rendered as circuit judge.

Mr. President, the statute of 1789 which was read by the Senator from Alabama shows that our forefathers regarded man as fallible. There may be men in some portions of this country who are so exalted that they are not controlled in their judgment by what their deliberate convictions were when presiding over the court below, or acting as a judge at nisi prius; but as an average a judge is a human being, nothing more, nothing less, and will be warped, as all of us are warped, by his opinions and convictions. I do not pretend to say that if I had deliberately formed a judgment upon conviction, as the mature result of my convictions, I could be easily changed. I do not think I could be, and therefore the point comes in which was made by the Senator from Arkansas, and it is true that the judge should be as he is represented; he should be blindfolded and hold the scales of justice equipoise; he should know neither the actor nor the reus; he should know neither side of the question and come in with his mind perfectly clear to form a judgment upon the law and the evidence.

But, sir, when he has already formed his judgment upon the law and the evidence, I would wipe that out; I would take it away. It has so often occurred in nisi prius courts that a piece of evidence has got before the jury somehow, and wrongfully got there, but still it is there, and the judge says "That is excluded from the jury;" but I should like to know what judge on this earth has ever been able to exclude that evidence from those jurymen's minds. You cannot do it. And so it is in the mind of that judge when he comes on the bench under oath deliberately, "I affirm this conclusion; I gave this ruling on this piece of evidence; I decided on this question of pleading thus and so, and I rendered this charge to the jury, and I did it conscientiously and after mature deliberation and full consideration, and I believe I was right." At all events, a man who has not got any firmness of opinion and purpose is unworthy to be a judge, and if he has that firmness of opinion and purpose an honest man could not well get rid of his convictions, and he carries those convictions with him into the appellate court.

Therefore I say that, in my judgment, the point made by the Senator from Missouri in his amendment is right. In my own State, while we have no statute on the subject, it is the invariable rule, as will be shown by the foot-note to every opinion where a judge was the judge of the nisi prius court and the case comes up and he has become a judge of the supreme court, having been the judge of the district court where the case was decided, he does not participate; he will not act upon it. I would be as much opposed to his giving his counsel and his argument as to his giving his vote.

I trust the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. INGALLS. Obviously the debate cannot close to-day. Important amendments are pending to which other Senators desire to address themselves. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 3, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several members addressed the Chair.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

Mr. SPEER. I ask unanimous consent to present and have printed in the RECORD a short petition on the subject of education.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has called the regular order.

Mr. SPEER. I understand the gentleman withdraws that call to enable me to present this petition.

Mr. BRIGGS. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraws it, I renew it.

Mr. RANDALL. I have not withdrawn it. I believe we should go right on and devote as much time as we can to the discussion of the tariff-commission bill.

LAWLESSNESS IN ARIZONA.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to make a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. A privileged report is in order.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the special message of the President of the United States relating to lawlessness in Arizona, have instructed me to report the same back with an accompanying bill, of which they recommend the passage.

Mr. RANDALL. Has the gentleman the right to make this report at this time under the rules?

Mr. HENDERSON. I have stated that it is a privileged report, because I understand that when the message was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs they were authorized by the House to report at any time.

Mr. RANDALL. What is the subject?

Mr. HENDERSON. The special message of the President relating to lawlessness in Arizona.

Mr. RANDALL. That will involve much discussion. It relates to the use of the Army as a posse comitatus in the Territories. I have no objection to the printing of the bill and report, so that we may have an opportunity to examine it.

The SPEAKER. This is a privileged matter.

Mr. RANDALL. The consideration of it is not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. RANDALL. The right to report at any time carries with it, of course, the right to consider; but I shall raise the question of consideration. Let the gentleman make his report now and have it printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois reports from the Committee on Military Affairs the bill which will be read.

The following bill (H. R. No. 6085) to amend section 15 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 18, 1878, was read a first and second time:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 15 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 18, 1878, be so amended as to allow the military forces to be employed as a posse comitatus to assist the civil authorities within any Territory of the United States to execute the laws therein when requested by the governor of such Territory.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON] desire to have this subject considered now?

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to have it considered now, or at least that it shall not lose the right of consideration at some early day.

Mr. RANDALL. I raise the question of consideration.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RANDALL. Debate is not in order pending the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The gentleman from Illinois reports from the Committee on Military Affairs the bill which has been read. The gentleman from Pennsylvania raises the question of consideration.

Mr. RANDALL. This matter will involve considerable discussion.

Mr. KASSON. How is this a privileged report?

The SPEAKER. It is privileged, because at the time the President's message on this subject was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed the committee by unanimous consent of the House was authorized to report at any time; and the right to report at any time carries with it the right to present consideration when the report is made.

Mr. KASSON. Allow me to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON] whether this report is one that will call naturally for debate?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir; a long debate.

Mr. KASSON. The emergency we all understand; and if this measure is acceptable to the House without discussion, I should not object to its being voted on now; but if it is to involve any considerable debate I hardly think it ought to be brought up this morning.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Is the gentleman from Illinois aware that a report has been rendered by the Judiciary Committee at the other end of the Capitol stating that there is no necessity for this legislation?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir; and I am satisfied, with all due respect to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, that they are in error in this regard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania raises the question of consideration.

Mr. KASSON. I ask that an order be made for the printing of the bill and report; and then the gentleman from Illinois can perhaps have the measure recommitted with the same privilege of calling it up at any time hereafter for consideration.

Mr. RANDALL. He can withdraw the report.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. There is no doubt that the right to report at any time carries with it the right of consideration at the time when the report is made. But suppose the report be made and consideration of it refused now, will it retain its right to consideration at any time when the gentleman may propose to call it up?

The SPEAKER. It will retain the right to be called up as privileged.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. At any time?

The SPEAKER. At any time.

Mr. COX, of New York. Has not the gentleman from Illinois the right to have this report printed and recommitted without its losing its privilege?

Mr. HENDERSON. I think that might be done.

The SPEAKER. It will lose no right by being printed and recommitted.

Mr. COX, of New York. I suggest that the matter take that course.

Mr. KASSON. Let it be printed in the RECORD and recommitted, the gentleman from Illinois reserving his right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks that the bill, together with the report, be printed——

Mr. RANDALL. I object to the continuation of the right to report at any time, if that requires unanimous consent.

Mr. COX, of New York. It does not require unanimous consent, as unanimous consent has already been given.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the right to report at any time has already been granted.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Illinois has already under that unanimous consent reported this bill to the House.

Mr. HENDERSON. If this bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, will not the right to report at any time continue under the former order of the House?

Mr. RANDALL. I will reserve that point of order.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that this concerns the safety of lives.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish it understood that this bill does not come back unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. KASSON. It concerns the safety of lives.

Mr. RANDALL. There is a difference of opinion among lawyers even, and we find the most eminent in the country asserting publicly and in official form that no such necessity exists as is claimed for the enactment of this bill.

Mr. KASSON. Nevertheless, so long as it is doubtful, the safety of lives demands something should be done by this House.

Mr. RANDALL. I am advised the Government is now taking every precaution as to the safety of life.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Illinois to move that the bill and report be printed and recommitted.

Mr. HENDERSON. With the right to report at any time.

Mr. RANDALL. And on that I reserve the point order.

The SPEAKER. That right has already been given by unanimous consent.

Mr. HASKELL. Let me ask whether this bill has not been read, and whether that does not insure its printing in the RECORD; therefore it need not be recommitted at all, but having been reported to the House, it is subject to be called up at any time, no point of order lying against it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is following the request of the chairman of the committee who reported the bill to the House.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection under the ruling of the Chair to have the bill and report printed and recommitted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state what he desires, and the Chair will submit the motion to the House.

Mr. HENDERSON. I consent that the bill and report may be printed, if I do not lose my right to call it up at any time. If the Speaker says I shall be entitled to that privilege I consent to the printing and recommital of the bill and report.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let the bill and report be printed in the RECORD, and that will avoid all difficulty.

Mr. HASKELL. Subject to be called up at any time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not going to give direction except as the gentleman having the bill and report in charge may wish. Is there unanimous consent to the printing of the bill and report in the RECORD? The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

The bill and report were ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

The bill and report are as follows:

An act to amend section 15 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 18, 1878.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 15 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 18, 1878, be so amended as to allow the military forces of the United States to be employed as a posse comitatus to assist the said authorities within any Territory of the United States to execute the laws therein, when requested by the governor of such Territory.

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States in relation to disorders and lawlessness in Arizona, having considered the same, respectfully report that in the opinion of your committee it is expedient to amend section 15 of the act of June 18, 1878, chapter 263, as suggested by the President in his said message, so as to allow the co-operation with the civil authorities of a Territory of a part of the Army as a posse comitatus; and believing that a necessity exists for such amendment, your committee report the accompanying bill to amend said section 15, and recommend the passage of the same.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. A number of gentlemen have bills they wish to introduce for reference only, and others have reports which they desire to make in order they may be referred and printed. Is there objection to granting unanimous consent for this purpose?

Mr RANDALL. If the tariff debate is to close on Thursday next, I demand the regular order.

Mr. JOYCE. I have reports to submit from the Committee on Invalid Pensions which should be printed and ready for consideration next Friday evening.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins, and committees will be called for reports.
